Some correspondence has recently been going on in Notes and Queries relative to the year of birth and name of the late Sir Michael Costa. Fétis gives the natal year as 1806, while Pougin says 1807. Mr. W. H. Cummings, speaking with all the authority of documentary evidence, writes: "Mr. Michael Costa was elected a member of the Royal Society of Musicians of Great Britain in November, 1847, and signed the roll of membership on December 5 following. His signature is 'Michael Andrew Angus Costa.' From his nomination, and an affidavit sworn at Bow Street Police Court, we learn that Michael was born at Naples on February 4, 1808." This information adds two little suspected names, both of a Scottish character, to the familiar "Michael," or "Michele," as he was doubtless baptised. Mr. Julian Marshall, who wrote the biographical notice in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," says that Costa gave him "1810" as the year of his birth. The register of deaths at Somerset House confirms this, and also records "Michael" as being the only Christian name. As a further contribution to the history of the subject, we have before us a very amusing letter written by Costa to an intimate friend, in which the austere and autocratic conductor signs himself: "Your most humble and very obedient servant—Mike"!

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

The Rev. Charles Scott, M.A., has an interesting paper in the Irish Ecclesiastical Gazette on Irish church music. He there speaks of a plain song which is claimed as peculiar to Ireland. Jebb, in his "Choral Service," devotes some space to it; describing it as "sung in the cathedrals of Christ Church and St. Patrick's and in the chapel of Trinity College." Its use at Christ Church appears to have ceased through the influence of a "meddlesome old man" unnamed, but the Confession may still be heard, and has even crossed to England. Says Mr. Scott:—

> The Confession was introduced into Leeds Parish Church by a Dublin man, and it is now known over the whole North of England, though few know its origin. I happened to be taking a service for an English Colony a few miles out of Rouen, and commenced to read the service, when, to my surprise, the congregation lustily sang out this harmonised Confession. I found that they were Lancashire and Yorkshire people, who worked in the neighbouring mills. It was a strange place in which to find the old Dublin Confession. This plain song presents many peculiar features, especially in the Litany. Indeed, the original plain song, in the tenor, is almost altogether lost. Though purists would regard this as a corruption, it is of great interest, and shows alterations unquestionably due to local influence. This makes it a local use, and, therefore, to be studied and cherished.

Some readers may be able to throw further light upon this matter.

There is trouble in All Saints' Church, Dieppe. The congregation having procured a new organ, the lady organist, commendably anxious to make the most of it, arranged to take some lessons from a French professor, who, as is not uncommon, belongs to the Roman Catholic Church. In her practice hours she was assisted at the bellows by a friend who also happens to be a Catholic. Will it be believed that the chaplain of All Saints' objected both to the teacher and the bellows-blower? He is said even to have "sternly vetoed" them. The result was that on the Sunday when it should first have been used, the new instrument remained silent, the organist, with some of the congregation, having betaken herself elsewhere. How is it that we hear so many strange stories of clerical intolerance and folly?

I take the following enigmatic sentence from a London paper. It occurs in a notice of Bach's "Passion," as performed at Mr. Henschel's final concert. "For such a fin-de-siècle revival, of course, the original German words were out of the question, and even the brand-new translation which is understood to have been provided with a view to this performance was altered by the soloists in many places." I have been asked the meaning of this deliverance, but could only refer the querist to its author.

Mr. Fitzroy Stewart, the gentleman who lately distinguished himself at a police court in defence of an organ-grinder, has further stated: "Small minorities consider themselves entitled, with their fads, to override the wishes of the majority." To him comes Mr. Wilson Noble and says: "You call those who object to noises a minority with fads. Even supposing we are in a minority—which I wholly deny—what has that to do with it? To the 'minority' the noises are an undoubted nuisance; to the 'majority' the absence of the noise cannot be considered a nuisance. Therefore, according to Mr. Stewart, a minority is to be annoyed because a majority does not object to what to them is no annoyance." The point is neatly put, but, perhaps, Mr. Stewart does not see the humour of it.

It is important to enlarge the vocabulary of musical criticism as much as possible, especially at a time when it is itself being criticised, and I lose no opportunity of gathering fresh expressions likely to be of use. I have a number of "finds" now before me, and hasten to give my colleagues a share in the advantages they may bring. Here is one: "The notes of the vocalist, slender and flute-like, pencilled off with consummate art in the refrain to the lightest shade of sound, thinner, clearer, further going, but audible throughout the great hall to the last vibration." Another: "Mr. (So-and-So) sang with all his fine sonorosity." A third: Mr. Somebody's song "is in the facile vein of the robustiously sentimental." A fourth: Madame Chose "capitulated to the insurgent admiration of the populace," which means, in ordinary English, that she granted an encore. I find other gems in the same collection. Miss A. "had to return to the keys." The orchestra played a symphony with "fortunate intention." "When the lovely snatches of romance glided recurrently into the theme, the audience had perfect moments," &c., &c.

From another source I have received further examples by which to profit. Here is a short string of them: "The artistes at once appealed for a testimony of their collective abilities by opening the programme with," &c. "The instrumentalists were, however, faulty in their treatment of light and shade—much of it being too coarse and heavy—and in the subdued passages it became an exertion to hear the strings at all." "The quality of the music was full, the treatment accurate and free, and the expression well defined. Indeed, it seemed to awaken a desire to hear more items of this kind." "Mr. X.'s treatment was masterly as to bowing and fingering, but not always successful in phrasing, and in the former work particularly something cold and out of tune."

I have heard more than a few epithets applied to Mendelssohn's Wedding March, but the strangest of all occurs in a Ceylon paper. "On Thursday morning last the marriage was solemnised of Mr. —— and Miss ——. The bride was conducted up the aisle by her brother, while the organ pealed forth the titivating strains of Mendelssohn's Wedding March." "Titivating" is none the less good because, in this connection, some of us may not be quite clear as to its meaning.

Dr. Henry Smith, writing in a Torquay journal, presents musicians with much food for thought. It might be imprudent to pass on the provender all at once, and I select only a few mouthfuls. "A pure note," says Dr. Smith, "consists of a definite number of vibrations. When the correct number of vibrations is given the musical ear at once recognises that the note is perfect. If more or fewer vibrations are given the note is not perfect and it is displeasing." Again: "The human voice is the natural means for producing sounds. The nearer an instrumental sound imitates the human voice the more perfect it is considered to be. The aim of the instrument maker is to produce sounds equal in quality to the human organism." Again, speaking of instruments: "Next to the violin is the harp. The fingers touch the strings and cause them to vibrate and almost respond perfectly to the operator's feelings. This is the case with all stringed instruments, hence the delight of the true musician with the violin or harp." Again: "The piano is a machine for producing musical sounds, and is an instrument which every true lover of music should avoid, inasmuch as it is impossible to produce upon it the effect desired by the true musician, that is, the same effect that can be produced on the violin or harp." Again: "When the 'Hymn of Praise' was given, as I once heard it, by 3,000 people, unaccompanied by instrumental music, then," &c. Here, perhaps, I had better stop.

CHURCH NEWS.

So old and well-received an axiom as that which tells us "Music is the handmaid of religion," needs no repetition; but it comes to mind when we count the world's musical losses of the past month. Two men have departed of distinct character and gifts, but having at least in common a full measure of that power for good—artistic earnestness. Both have in different ways added much to the treasures of sacred art. Their work adds to previously existing evidence of the near connection between religion and the most spiritual of the arts. It is indeed noteworthy that musicians, both as composers and performers, labour perhaps more extensively and directly than the workers in any other department of intellectual life in the interests of sacred art.

Johannes Brahms, unrivalled as a maker of abstract music in the later half of this century, and George Mursell Garrett, from a child a Church musician, stood too far apart in their artistic aims, means, methods, and opportunities to be compared in any given direction; and in the case of men who have completed their labours, perhaps thoughts of contemporary association are better than studied comparisons.

To those who ask, Is England really a musical nation? one emphatic answer might well be this, in no country is the music of Bach more earnestly studied and fully appreciated, than in Great Britain. The St. Matthew and St. John Passion Music claim a large measure of public attention, and in no cathedral or church is the former setting heard under more impressive conditions and listened to more earnestly than in St. Paul's Cathedral. The rendering on the 13th ult. was one characterised by remarkable care as regards the solo work, and the difficult choruses were almost invariably given with marked success. Dr. Martin, whose responsibilities as organist of the Cathedral it would be interesting to compare with the comparatively light duties of the holder of his office sixty years ago, directed the music with his customary tact and ability. Mr. Macpherson played as voluntaries a movement from Rheinberger's Sonata in C minor and the last movement from Tschaïkowsky's Pathetic Symphony; in the last case not only displaying the organ in its now widely accepted position as the greatest medium of adaptation from the orchestral score, but illustrating the justifiable habit of regarding serious instrumental music, untrammeled by secular associations, as available for church use.

On Thursday in Passion week, according to the re-adoption of the old name for the fifth week in Lent, Mr. Lee Williams's expressive and musicianly work, "The Last Night at Bethany," was given at St. Saviour's Collegiate Church. In all directions, indeed, evidence will be found of the increasing recognition of the value of the Church Oratorio as an eloquent form of musical sermon. At St. Anne's, Soho, Marylebone Parish Church, St. James's, Paddington, and, for that matter, at many of our Cathedrals and at a large number of our principal Parish Churches, the two most valued settings of the "Passion Music" by Bach, and other works suitable to the solemn season preceding Easter, have been given, apart from appropriate music used in the course of the ordinary services.

The Passiontide music at St. Andrew's, Wells Street, under the able control of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, included Schütz's "Seven last Words from the Cross," to be heard only in this church, we believe. Selections from Spohr's neglected "Calvary" were also given. At Leeds Parish Church Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion Music and Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," the latter accompanied by the Leeds Permanent Orchestra, have been given under Mr. Benton's excellent guidance. The union of a local orchestra with a local choral force for Church duty is an arrangement worthy of all praise.

Notable performances with orchestra of Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion music were given in St. Mary's Cathedral, Edinburgh, on the 9th ult., under the direction of Mr. Collison, and in Glasgow Cathedral, on the 15th ult., under the direction of Mr. Joseph Bradley. A new oratorio, apparently specially adapted for church use, was performed at Eastry Church on the 8th ult. This work, from the pen of the Rev. C. Dudley Lampen, has a title which explains itself, "Christus Rex." Performances have been given of Gounod's "Redemption" in the Pro-Cathedral, Liverpool, and at St. Paul's, Edinburgh. This work continues to grow in favour with the oratorio admirers of this country, and it is heard in church with great frequency. Of a very widely extended popularity is also Stainer's "Crucifixion." Reports are to hand of its effective rendering in many churches during the past season, including a performance at the Cathedral of Halifax (Nova Scotia), under the direction and with the organ accompaniment of Mr. Frank Gatward.

In the Churches of the Roman Communion, the ancient prototype of the sublime settings by Bach, the Passion Music by Vittoria, has been in general use here and abroad, and the touching "Improperia" of the Good Friday morning service has again moved the hearts of thousands of worshippers. The settings of the Passion narratives by Vittoria and the little-used setting by Suriano consist of harmonised sentences corresponding with the oratorio chorus and interposed with the very ancient Plain Song intoned passages based upon the "Cantus Passionis." Judging from the early musical treatment of the greatest event of the world's history, both in service music and in the ancient miracle plays in this and other countries, it would appear that the development of the Passion Music has been the greatest factor in the growth of the oratorio. The music of the "Improperia" by Palestrina has undergone a good many variations from the original text and has been imitated by several other composers. There are some interesting settings of the Antiphons preceding Mass on Palm Sunday, and having reference to the procession into Jerusalem. One modern setting of a simple and effective character has even been attributed to Schubert, but no satisfactory authority has been deduced for such a statement.

In dealing with Latin Church music, it should be noted that Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" and Gounod's "Gallia," among other works, have recently been heard at the Oratory, Brompton, under advantageous circumstances. In the same great church, on Good Friday evening, a very striking setting of the "Stabat Mater" was given, which is here exclusively in use at the Oratory. The composer of this setting of the ancient hymn, L. R. Ermel, once a musical student of distinction in France, gained the first prize given by the Queen of Belgium at a competition in Ghent in 1840, for the best composition for voices and orchestra set to the "Stabat Mater." This work was introduced at the Brompton Oratory by the late Thomas Wingham, who enjoyed an artistic reputation in Belgium. It is a composition somewhat Italian in line of thought, but in all respects very musicianly, often of marked originality, and always effectively placed before the listener. No better representation of this interesting MS. work would be possible than that given at the Brompton Oratory, under the guidance of the painstaking and enthusiastic choirmaster, Mr. A. Barclay Jones, Thomas Wingham's successor, and with so talented an organist as Mr. E. d'Evry at the keyboard. On Easter-Day orchestral accompaniments were effectively in evidence at this, the finest of the London Roman Catholic churches.

To turn back, mention must be made of the quaint service, including the presentation of the Queen's Maundy gifts, at Westminster Abbey, on the 15th ult. An effective new anthem from the ever-ready and practised pen of Professor Bridge, the organist, was heard for the first time. The Church Orchestral Society did duty on Easter-Day at St. John's, Wilton Place, Mr. A. J. Eyre's admirably-written Communion Service in E flat being an important feature of the morning Service. In the absence of Dr. Huntley, Mr. Percy Sharman was the director of the orchestra.

A careful reading of Sir John Stainer's very useful and effective musical meditation on "The Crucifixion," at the Second Congregational Church, Holyoke, Mass., is noted from America, the musical director being the organist, Mr. W. C. Hammond. Although Mr. Moody has recently complained of the American churches not being sufficiently used for public services, it is evident substantial progress in the way of musical services and church organ recitals is being made on the other side of the Atlantic. Mr. Moody's complaint is, that whereas in America one "cannot get into many of the churches with a crowbar," albeit not the agent good people would surely desire to make use of as the means of getting into church, in the great cathedrals and churches in England "there is something going on every night and two or three times a day." Mr. Moody will not have very long to wait, apparently, before he finds the American churches constantly opened; and he will possibly note that the power of sacred art in connection with public worship is claiming more and more the attention and guiding the action of church authorities in the States.

Not without interest at this season, and generally in connection with the more serious forms of Church music, is a recent complaint in the columns of the Gazzetta Musicale, published at Milan, that the traditions of the Palestrina school are disappearing if not lost. This statement agrees with what has been recently asserted in these columns. It is high time, indeed, the study of the history of the musical art should bear more practical fruits, and the traditions of great musical epochs should receive careful and practical attention.

The "Victoria Book of Hymns," musically edited by Dr. J. Varley Roberts and the Rev. W. H. Draper, contains such musicianly contributions as we have now a right to expect in this country. Similarly, "Twelve Hymns, with Tunes, in commemoration of the Queen's long reign," are well worthy of the great event close at hand. The pièce d'occasion is proverbially difficult to write. Idiom and association form distinct powers of production; though there is a still nobler faculty of inspiration soaring above current lines of thought; but idiomatic thought should be present in tunes intended for prompt, hearty congregational use. The writers of the words in these two patriotic issues from different publishers just referred to, and the eminent composers of the tunes, have, however, displayed in their work in connection with the public worship aspect of a great epoch, singular earnestness, and have supplied much that is eloquent both in art and in patriotism.

ORGAN NEWS.

Every attempt to combine such imposing forces as the modern orchestra and concert-room organ must be regarded with interest. The Symphony in D minor by M. Guilmant, best known in its solo sonata form; the Concertos, to name them in the order of production, by Professor Prout, Mr. H. Gadsby, and Dr. C. Harford Lloyd, with the Symphony including parts for both organ and pianoforte by Dr. Saint-Saëns, and the "Fantasie Dialoguée" by M. Boëlmann, are among the comparatively few modern works of the kind one can readily call to mind. The last-named work was only recently heard for the first time in England at the Lamoureux Concerts, with the composer at the keyboard. With many good points, the "Fantasie" illustrated some of the difficulties as well as suggested some of the possibilities of a combination of the two greatest musical powers. The most striking point, the resonant climax, imposing as it was, contained a lesson, rather than expressed a success, regarding the extreme rarity of the successful union of the full power of a large organ with the modern orchestra. The chief difficulty in effecting this union may be said to lie in the conflicting conditions of the two great tone atmospheres. The artificial harmonics of the organ come too much into collision with the pervading natural harmonics so extensively created in the orchestra. Then there is the rigid tuning of the unbending organ sounds struggling with the elastic temperament of the orchestra. Besides these main points of sound-producing divergence, there must be added the cold, inexpressive tone of the imitative organ registers when heard in conjunction with the real instruments in the hands of living players producing sounds in single notes under direct personal effort; and in this same connection, it should also be noted, the mass of organ tones lack the very direct attack and individual control which goes so much to make the force and expression of orchestral effects. In truth, as far as the combination of the organ and orchestra usually tends to make sympathetic, effective music, it must be allowed the deep pedal notes producing sounds, beyond the power of single-toned instruments governed only by fingers or brought into existence by the power of human lungs, form the most striking organic tone-independence. Then of the harmonies produced from the manuals of the organ, the eight and four-feet flue stops are by far the most satisfactory tone-mediums to be heard in harmonic conjunction with the orchestra.

A more than usually careful study of the resources of both organic and orchestral effects seems needed on the part of both composers and organ-players, in order to develop what may ultimately be a truly sublime symphonic combination, the union of the two giants of the world of instrumental music. Modern composers have fully realised the difficulties of the combination of organ and orchestra, even though it cannot be said modern art has yet fully succeeded in largely utilising the powers of the complete concert organ in union with the orchestra of our day.

The excellent new organ built for Holy Trinity Church, Tulse Hill, by Messrs. Norman and Beard, has been opened by the able organist, Dr. H. Walmsley Little, and additional recitals by such other eminent organists as Mr. W. S. Hoyte and Mr. A. Hollins have been arranged. It is satisfactory to note that the instrument has been tuned to the normal diapason—a pitch nowhere more appropriately adopted than in the case of the church organ. A new organ, built by Messrs. Wadsworth, of Manchester, has also been opened by the talented organist, Miss McKnight, at King William's College, Isle of Man.

Mr. T. R. Rutherford, of North Berwick, gave a recital at the Warwick Road Congregational Chapel, Coventry, on March 28. The programme consisted chiefly of selections from Schubert's instrumental works, and included Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture. This work, chiefly known to organ players by the skilful arrangement of the late Dr. W. J. Westbrook, finds marked favour at present as a recital piece, even though the elaborate scoring cannot receive any adequate treatment on the organ keyboard. At the opening of the fine organ built by Messrs. J. W. Walker and Sons, of London, for St. Mary's Collegiate Church, Port Elizabeth, Mr. Roger Ascham gave an interesting recital. The music included a novelty, a Scherzo in D minor on a pedal bass by a composer named Petterson. Bach and Mendelssohn were represented; English organ music found a place in compositions by Dr. Hopkins and Mr. E. H. Lemare, and Lemmens's "Fanfare," once more popular than it is now, was also included in the programme.

One of the most satisfactory signs of judicious advancement in a goodly number of recent organ specifications is the appearance of the 32-feet double diapason in pedal organ schemes. From an acoustical point of view this stop has long been wanted in all large instruments having 16-feet stops on at least two of the manual organs. Naturally the questions of space and expense are present in this connection. However, a good organ should have ample space, and should be complete by an addition which, in proportion to effect, is by no means expensive. When want of space does not admit of the presence of the longest pipes of the open 32-feet register, then a sub-bass of the same pitch is a valuable substitute. This stop is more effective than the pedal quint stop, used with 16-feet stops to produce sounds of 32-feet octave, as "combination tones"; especially when made with pipes of the right "scale" and "voiced" with due care, in view of minimising the tendency of stopped pipes to produce the twelfth above their nominal pitch. One is glad to note that the pedal "quint" has ceased to retain a full measure of the favour of organists and organ-builders. Undoubtedly our larger instruments are gaining greatly in depth and richness of tone by means of more developed pedal organs.

Mr. John Hopkins, for many years organist of Rochester Cathedral, was presented with a testimonial, in the form of an illuminated address and a purse, on his seventy-fifth birthday.

We hear with much regret that Dr. John Naylor has, owing to ill-health, been obliged to resign the post of organist at York Minster.

GEORGE MURSELL GARRETT.

In the many cathedrals and churches where "Garrett in D" and "Garrett in F" are favourites, the news that their gifted composer had closed his earthly career would come with sincere and deep regret—a regret which finds a true echo in these columns. George Mursell Garrett was cathedral bred and born. He first saw the light at Winchester, on June 8, 1834, where his father was one of the Cathedral lay-clerks and master of the choir school. As a boy of ten he became a chorister of New College, Oxford, of which the then organist was Dr. Stephen Elvey. In those pre-Stainer Oxford days the boys had no grounding in music. They sang by ear, and young Garrett never had a lesson in pianoforte or harmony during his choristership. After three years at Oxford, and owing to an attack of glandular swelling, the young chorister returned to Winchester. He was first articled to Mr. B. Long, the permanent deputy of old and disabled Dr. Chard, organist of Winchester Cathedral. In 1849, on Chard's death, Samuel Sebastian Wesley came to Winchester from Leeds, and Garrett's articles were transferred to the new organist. Many were the funny stories that Dr. Garrett could tell of Wesley's eccentricities, sayings, and doings. One specimen must suffice. During a performance of his (Wesley's) fine anthem "Ascribe unto the Lord," the basses sang their recitative, "Noses have they and smell not," in a vulgar, nasal tone, when Wesley remarked, in his most sarcastic manner: "No, they keep their noses to sing through." At the age of sixteen young Garrett was organist of one of the parish churches at Winchester, in addition to his cathedral work; at that time he often used to play at six services on a Sunday.

In 1854 there came to Garrett, through Dr. Walmisley, the Cambridge Professor of Music, an offer of the organistship of Madras Cathedral. As it was a good appointment the Winchester youth accepted it, but after two years' experience of the Indian climate, he returned to England. He very soon obtained the appointment of organist of St. John's, Cambridge, to which he was elected without competition in 1857, and the duties of which he discharged with conspicuous ability almost up to the time of his death. Dr. Garrett graduated Mus. Bac. in 1857 and Mus. Doc. ten years later, both degrees being taken at Cambridge under Sterndale Bennett's professorship. In 1873 he was elected organist to the University of Cambridge, in succession to Dr. John Larkin Hopkins; and in 1878 he had the rare distinction, for a musician who did not fill a professorial chair, of receiving the degree of M.A., propter merita, which made him a member of the Senate. Dr. Garrett had a large experience in examination work. Since Sterndale Bennett's death, in 1875, he has set the papers and examined for music in the Cambridge Senior and Junior Locals. He also examined for Durham University, and frequently for the Royal College of Organists, before whom he gave a valuable series of lectures on Counterpoint two years ago, which have since been published.

The news that Dr. Garrett had come to London to undergo a serious operation gave rise to much sympathy and anxiety on the part of those who knew his sterling worth and high character. A testimonial in acknowledgment of his valued services to the cause of church music was actively promulgated. But, alas! Dr. Garrett never received the tangible result of this effort, though he was probably aware of the many practical tokens of regard and esteem which it called forth. He returned to Cambridge, but only to die. He drew his last breath at his home, Park Side, on the evening of the 8th ult.

Dr. Garrett was essentially a church composer. A glance at the catalogue of Messrs. Novello will show his activity in that department. Services, anthems, and chants are to be found there in goodly number and of excellent quality. Moreover, his music has attained a deservedly widespread popularity, not only by reason of its melodic charm, but because Garrett worthily maintained the best traditions of the old English church composers, who wrote for voices, which they treated as such, instead of making them serve the duty of mere accompaniments to what in some modern church compositions is more often in the nature of an organ voluntary. His larger works comprised the oratorio "The Shunammite" (performed at the Hereford Festival of 1882), "The Two Advents," and his popular Harvest Cantata. Three of his organ pieces are contained in Novello's "Original Compositions for the Organ," and mention must also be made of his songs and part-songs. It was very appropriate that Dr. Garrett should have been asked to edit the organ music of his distinguished master, Dr. S. S. Wesley, a duty which he most ably and sympathetically discharged. His conscientious views on editing will be found in the preface he wrote to a new edition of Wesley's noble Service in E, which was one of the last occupations of the busy brain which is now for ever at rest.

We are much indebted to one of Dr. Garrett's old pupils, the Rev. Canon F. A. J. Hervey, Rector of Sandringham and Chaplain to the Queen, for kindly contributing the following personal recollections of the departed musician. Canon Hervey writes: "My acquaintance with Dr. Garrett began in 1866, when, as an undergraduate at Trinity College, Cambridge, I took lessons from him in counterpoint and organ playing. Our relations as master and pupil soon developed into an intimate friendship, which lasted unabated till his death. At the time when I first knew him there was a certain 'stand-offishness' about him towards others which I could never quite understand, but which, however, he never showed to myself. He was somewhat sarcastic too, and had a keen and never failing sense of humour, which now and then may have added a sting to some of his sharp sayings. I once heard a young minor canon complain to him of his having to chant the Litany with a lay clerk, both kneeling at the same desk. 'It's like harnessing a horse and a donkey together,' he petulantly exclaimed. 'Which is which?' blandly and very quietly asked Garrett. But any angularity that may have been noticeable in him twenty or thirty years ago, almost, if not entirely, disappeared as he advanced in life; while the true kindness of heart and the geniality of temperament, which was always underlying, though never concealed by, such superficial tricks of speech and manner as those to which I have referred, shone out more and more conspicuously every year till he was taken from us. As a teacher he was remarkably efficient and conscientious. Giving a lesson was to him an important and most serious duty. He would explain a knotty problem in counterpoint in simple, colloquial, perspicuous language, putting it so clearly and so forcibly before one that there could be no doubt about it. Dr. Garrett was a very agreeable and amusing companion, especially when one got him on the subject of his early Winchester days and his old master, Dr. S. S. Wesley. He was a hospitable and genial host and a staunch and warm friend. His old pupils and many others deplore the sad loss which creates an irreparable gap in their midst."

The funeral of Dr. Garrett took place on the 14th ult. The service at St. John's College, where for so many years he had officiated as organist, was attended by a large and representative congregation. The anthem was S. S. Wesley's "Blessed be the God and Father," sung by the combined choirs of St. John's and Trinity Colleges. Dr. Mann, Organist of King's, played the Dead March in "Saul" as the cortège left the Chapel for Mill Road Cemetery, where the interment took place. The portrait of Dr. Garrett (which appears as an "extra supplement" to this issue) is from a photograph by Mr. R. H. Lord, Market Street, Cambridge.

THE ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Dr. Hubert Parry's "Job" were sung on March 25 by the Royal Choral Society, at the Albert Hall. The former was conducted by Dr. Bridge, who secured an excellent performance of Spohr's suave and richly harmonised strains. The soloists were Miss Esther Palliser, Madame Emily Himing, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Daniel Price, all of whom discharged their respective duties in an effective manner. A very fine rendering was given of "Job," under the direction of the composer, the choristers entering into the spirit of the work with the utmost sympathy and singing the fine series of plague choruses and other choral portions with magnificent unanimity of expression and attack. Mr. Henschel was the exponent of the part of Job, which he interpreted with his customary intelligence and keen dramatic perception. Mr. McKay and Mr. Price were again satisfactory soloists, and the part of the Shepherd Boy was rendered with notable skill and charm by Miss Hilda Foster, a pupil of the Royal College of Music.

On Good Friday the customary performance of "The Messiah" took place, the soloists being Miss Esther Palliser, Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Santley. The choristers sang the familiar music with their usual precision and intelligence, and the orchestral portion was efficiently rendered, Mr. Balfour presiding with his usual skill at the organ. Professor Bridge conducted.

QUEEN'S HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

No better performance of "The Redemption" has been given in London of late years than that by this Society on the 16th ult. (Good Friday). Everything favoured Gounod's popular sacred work being heard to advantage, for whilst the choralists were evidently pleased with the task before them, efficiency in other departments was secured and a large audience was as deeply moved as ever by the beautiful melodies and devotional expression with which the score is so plentifully studded. "The Redemption" has now too firm a hold on the public to be easily shaken, and the interpretation on this occasion was much more calculated to win than to estrange friends. Mr. Randegger, under whose direction the choir has so vastly increased its prestige, must have been proud both of his choralists and instrumentalists. His baton invariably controlled energy, which otherwise might have exceeded discretion; but Mr. Randegger is too experienced a conductor to unduly check the enthusiasm that is among the most hopeful characteristics of his vocal host. The chorus "For us the Christ," ending the first part, the dramatic scenes, and the imposing Ascension chorus "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," were in particular very finely sung, and their reception left no doubt of the undiminished favour with which the trilogy is regarded by the cultured section of the community. The two Narrators had competent representatives in Mr. Iver McKay (to whose voice the music is perfectly suited) and in Mr. Lemprière Pringle. Of Mr. Andrew Black's rendering of the tender music of the Saviour there is no need to add to what has often previously been said. He sings the music as though he liked it, for which there is the most legitimate reason; but is careful not to let sentiment in such matters go too far. The lady principals in this successful performance were Madame Marie Duma, Miss Margaret Hoare, and Miss Hilda Wilson, each equal to far more taxing, if not correspondingly thankful, labour.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

Dvorák's first published symphony (in D, Op. 60), which formed the pièce de résistance of the second concert at the Queen's Hall, on the 7th ult., must have been a novelty to many in the audience. It had not been heard in London for a good many years, though in the eighties it used to be a prime favourite at the Covent Garden Promenade concerts, conducted by the late Gwillym Crowe. At that time its wealth of fresh and fascinating ideas, splendid orchestration, striking rhythms, and exhilarating spirit raised hopes for the future of the symphonist Dvorák, which his subsequent contributions to the highest department of purely orchestral music have but partly justified. For, though they contain single movements reaching a higher level than anything to be found in his "No. 1" (we need but refer to the delicious Allegro grazioso in his fourth and the wonderfully poetic Largo in the "American" symphonies), it can hardly be asserted that, on the whole, they show that advance in elevation and epic grandeur which the composer's riper years and experience should have led us to expect. While we are referring to Dvorák's first, fourth, and fifth symphonies, may we enquire what has become of Nos. 2 and 3, especially the former, in D minor, a fine work which was composed expressly for the Philharmonic Society, and performed under the composer's direction at the concert of April 22, 1885, but never since? To return to the concert under notice, the performance, conducted by Sir Alexander C. Mackenzie, though somewhat lacking in refinement, especially in the Adagio, was spirited and vigorous, while the tone produced by the orchestra was superb. Mr. Frederick Cliffe's melodious and effective Violin Concerto, originally produced at the last Norwich Festival, was finely played by Mr. Tivadar Nachèz. It improves greatly on acquaintance, and is well worthy of the composer of the admirable C minor Symphony (Op. 1), which was received with genuine enthusiasm by public and press alike when it was produced at the Crystal Palace on Easter Eve eight years ago, but is never performed now, presumably because it is English! Mr. Edward Lloyd sang the Preislied from Wagner's "Meistersinger" and "Come, Margarita, come," from Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch." He was in splendid voice. Mendelssohn's ever-fresh "Hebrides" and Schubert's "Rosamunde" overtures completed the programme, which was preceded by the Dead March in "Saul," in honour of Johannes Brahms.

THE BACH CHOIR.

It was originally intended that the Bach Festival, inaugurated in 1895 by the Society which is named after the Leipzig Cantor, should take place once in three years, but the first celebration proved so successful that it was decided to repeat it this year instead of next, and the large audiences that assembled in the Queen's Hall, on the 6th, 8th, and 10th ult., justified the anticipatory measure. As on the first occasion, this year's Festival was commenced with the Passion Music according to St. Matthew and concluded with the B minor Mass, the intervening day being occupied by choral and instrumental selections. The Passion Music was sung in German, a procedure which can scarcely be commended. To those who were familiar with this language the various modes of pronunciation by the English singers were disturbing, and to those who had no acquaintance with the tongue of the Fatherland the work lost much in impressiveness by being separated from a text about which cling many hallowed associations. The soloists in the interpretation this year were Miss Fillünger, Madame Marian McKenzie, and Messrs. Robert Kaufmann, Kennerley Rumford, and Francis Harford. The two ladies sang with their usual conscientiousness, and the two last-named gentlemen were fairly capable exponents of what they had to do. Mr. Kaufmann's voice is admirable, alike in quality and compass, and his singing was distinguished by fine perception of the requirements of the music. The choir was assisted by the choristers of St. Mary Abbotts, Kensington, who took part in the chorales, greatly adding thereby to their impressiveness. A feature of the performance was the endeavour, by increasing the number of the wood-wind players and by the use of the harpsichord in the recitatives of the narration, to produce as nearly as possible the orchestral effects common in the time of Bach, and although to modern ears eight flutes and eight oboes were not so pleasant as two of each, an old world atmosphere was certainly imparted to the music, and Mr. Fuller Maitland's excellent harpsichord playing provided an admirable contrast to the tones of the organ and orchestra.

The two most important works on the selection day were the Church cantatas "Wachet, betet" ("Watch and pray") and "Wachet auf" ("Wake, awake!"). The former was originally composed as an Advent cantata, but according to Spitta it was altered by Bach in the year 1723, for use on the twenty-sixth Sunday after Trinity. The work is not one of the best of its composer's production in this form, but it contains a very fine bass air, "Seligster Erquickungs-Tag" ("O! day of resurrection blest"), which was effectively sung by Mr. Harford. The other cantata is one of the finest which Bach wrote, and the violin obbligato of the soprano and bass duet, "Wann kommst du" ("When wilt Thou come"), was played by Dr. Joachim, the vocalists being Mrs. Hutchinson and Mr. Kennerley Rumford. Dr. Joachim also played the Concerto in E for violin (with orchestra of strings) and the famous chaconne from the D minor Suite. The concerto is a thoroughly characteristic work in three movements, the first of which is remarkable for the effective use made in the development of the first three notes of the opening theme. Sir Walter Parratt gave a brilliant performance of the great Toccata and Fugue in D minor for organ, his interpretation being notable for lucidity and command of the various tone colours at his disposal. The Orchestral Suite in D (No. 1) and the final quartet and chorus from the Church cantata "Ich hatte viel Bekümmerniss" completed the programme. Madame Marian McKenzie and Mr. Kaufmann were the other vocalists.

The vocal soloists in the Mass on the third day were Madame Medora Henson, Madame McKenzie, Mr. Kaufmann, and Mr. Andrew Black, all of whom sang with admirable appreciation of their respective parts. The choruses were sung with care and intelligence, but the dramatic character of certain portions of the work seemed to be scarcely realised by the choristers. This deficiency of perception was noticeable in their singing throughout the Festival and was often productive of a feeling of monotony. Professor Villiers Stanford conducted.

HENSCHEL CONCERT.

Mr. Henschel concluded, on the 1st ult., at St. James's Hall, his eleventh season of orchestral concerts with a performance of Bach's Passion Music according to St. Matthew. The occasion was notable as being the last concert of a series which has been carried on with great determination and commendable enterprise, not seldom in the face of much discouragement. The wisdom of Mr. Henschel's decision to lay down the orchestral baton can scarcely be questioned, but it should always be remembered that the perseverance of this versatile musician has contributed to the present satisfactory popularity of orchestral music of the highest class. Another feature of this farewell concert was the adoption of Dr. Troutbeck's version of Bach's masterpiece. The former English edition, which was edited by Sterndale Bennett, was a great accomplishment at the time of its issue in 1862; but fuller acquaintance has been made with Bach's music since that period, and the faultiness of the English text, and of the edition generally, has become more and more glaring. Dr. Troutbeck's revision is therefore very welcome. It follows the German text with greater faithfulness, and, what is even more important, it is easier to sing. Under these circumstances it is somewhat surprising to find many conductors still using the former score, and it is to be hoped that the prominence given by Mr. Henschel to the later edition will cause it to be more widely adopted. Mr. Henschel's interpretation may be placed amongst the most successful of his achievements as a conductor. The choruses had manifestly been carefully rehearsed and the devotional spirit of the music was throughout admirably expressed. The accompaniments were also rendered in a manner well in keeping with the character of the music. The soloists were scarcely so successful. Miss Dale is one of our most charming concert singers, but her vocal organ lacks the power to do full justice to Bach's music, and Mr. Charles Clarke also failed to impart sufficient dignity into his delivery of the words of Christ. Mr. Daniel Price, however, was excellent in the bass solos, and Madame Marian McKenzie and Mr. James Leyland were also satisfactory exponents of their respective parts. Lady Hallé was the solo violinist, and skilful assistance was given by Mr. Henry Bird at the organ and by Mr. J. M. Coward and Mr. Oliver King respectively at the harmonium and pianoforte.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first series of Mr. Newman's symphony concerts at the Queen's Hall was concluded on the 3rd ult., the best proof of the success of which was the commencement, on the 24th ult., of another season of like performances, which are to be given on six consecutive Saturday afternoons. The chief factor in the attractiveness of these concerts undoubtedly has been the high standard of efficiency attained by Mr. Henry Wood's orchestra. Much astuteness has also been shown in the construction of the programmes by the judicious inclusion of widely accepted and new works. Thus the selection on the 3rd ult. comprised Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony and the first performance in London of the "Danses Polovtsiennes," from Alexander Borodine's opera "Prince Igor." The latter are scored in too noisy a manner for entire enjoyment in the concert-room, but the wild force of the themes and the virility and glowing colour with which they are treated make the music memorable. All that executive skill could do for Dvorák's symphonic poem "Der Wassermann" ("The Water-Sprite") was done by Mr. Wood's instrumentalists, but their efforts failed to increase esteem for the work, which seems to be another example of the want of perception occasionally shown by composers for what is suitable for musical treatment. A magnificent rendering was accorded to Liszt's fourth Hungarian Rhapsody, and no less striking were the performances of Grieg's first "Peer Gynt" suite and the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin."

MOTTL CONCERTS.

Mr. Mottl devoted his second concert (given at Queen's Hall on March 30) to illustrations of "The Development of the Overture." We cannot honestly say that the experiment was altogether satisfactory, regarded either from an artistic or an educational point of view. For enjoyment, there was too much overture—one became conscious of a sense of boredom; for instruction, there was not enough—it is obviously absurd to suppose that the development of any important art-form during 150 years can be fairly shown in one evening. A list of the overtures performed is given in another column, and reference to it will show the incompleteness, and, at the same time, the redundancy of the scheme. Lulli, who practically "invented" the overture, was not represented at all, and Cherubini, Rossini, Auber, Schumann, and Brahms were equally ignored; Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" (or "Fingal's Cave")—though it is not properly an "overture" at all, but what we now-a-days call a "symphonic poem"—was selected in preference to "Ruy Blas" or "A Midsummer Night's Dream," both of which are "overtures" (i.e., preludes to dramatic works) in the legitimate sense of the term; and the Wagner selection included two overtures ("Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser"), the essential differences between which are so slight that, in so condensed a scheme as the one now under discussion, they might safely have been ignored. Fortunately, however, Mr. Schulz Curtius's patrons are not too critical, and "The Development of the Overture," as exhibited on this occasion, was followed by quite a large audience, of which, presumably, the major part found ample reason for satisfaction in the very excellent performances. In this respect the concert left room for some adverse criticism only to hearers who found themselves unable to accept some of Mr. Mottl's tempi as an improvement on those to which they have hitherto been accustomed.

The concert of the 13th ult. proved interesting for many reasons. Mr. Mottl conducted Beethoven's Choral Symphony, and there was a specially engaged and very fine choir from Leeds. Last but not least we heard for the first time in England, unless we are much mistaken, those much discussed and vehemently denounced alterations in the scoring which Wagner suggested with a view to making certain passages more effective. Herr Mottl's reading of the symphony was remarkable for breadth and nobility, though we cannot help thinking that his tempi in the slow movement were open to objection. Such a slow, lumbering Adagio we have never heard. The heavenly melodies appeared dragged out of all proportion; an increase in length without corresponding breadth. The Scherzo was perfectly played; very fast, but strictly rhythmical. In the Finale the Leeds singers, who had been splendidly trained by Mr. Adolf Beyschlag, did yeomen's service. They were also heard in the two most hackneyed of all Wagner selections—viz., the bridal chorus from "Lohengrin" and the march and chorus from "Tannhäuser." It was a revelation to hear these pieces sung in this fresh and beautiful manner. The preludes to acts I. and III. from "Lohengrin" and the Waldweben from "Siegfried," all magnificently played, completed the programme. Misses Esther Palliser and Rosa Green, and Messrs. O. Fischer-Sobell and Andrew Black greatly distinguished themselves as the soloists in the symphony.

LAMOUREUX CONCERTS.

Only brief notice is required for the purposes of record of the concluding concerts given at the Queen's Hall by M. Lamoureux. The programme on March 25 contained Schumann's Symphony in D minor, commonly known as No. 4, and the overture to Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini," both works being finely played. On the following evening was heard, for the first time in England, M. Saint-Saëns's latest Pianoforte Concerto in F (Op. 103), which was written in the early part of last year, during the composer's visit to Egypt, and was produced at the concert given on June 2 last at the Salle Pleyel, Paris, in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of its composer's first appearance as a pianist. The work is thoroughly French in its conception and treatment, and may unhesitatingly be pronounced to be one of the most original and individual of M. Saint-Saëns's utterances. The pianoforte part was most effectively rendered by M. Louis Diémer, to whose remarkably facile and brilliant style the music is in the utmost sympathy. The orchestration is extremely picturesque, especially that of the second movement, which the composer in a letter to a friend has described as "A sort of voyage to the East" as he sailed down the Nile. The programme on this occasion also contained Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Schumann's "Hermann and Dorothea" overture, the only complete portion of an opera begun in December, 1851. The series of concerts came to an end on March 27, when the orchestra was heard at its best in M. Charpentier's Sérénade from his suite "Impressions of Italy," the prelude to "The Flight into Egypt" from Berlioz's "Childhood of Christ," and the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." M. Lamoureux is announced to give another series of performances at the same hall in November next.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The programme of Saturday, March 27, was devoted to Gounod's "Redemption," concerning the performance of which it is enough to say that the solos were entrusted to Madame Medora Henson, Miss Jessie Scott, Miss Greta Williams, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Santley. The Crystal Palace choir rendered a very fair if not full measure of justice to the choral portion of the work, and the band acquitted themselves of an easy task with their usual skill.

After the very successful production of Mr. Edward Elgar's cantata "King Olaf," on the 3rd ult., it appears more certain than ever that this highly-gifted musician is destined to play an important part in shaping the future of English music. Amongst the qualities which go towards making a composer who shall leave his mark on the history of his art, the inestimable gift of melody must ever be placed first and foremost. This Mr. Elgar possesses in quite an unusual degree, as a perusal of the score of "King Olaf" proves. Such strains as the beautiful Saga motive in the finely conceived Prologue, the powerful theme at the words "Here amid icebergs" in the "Challenge of Thor," the whole of the delightfully tuneful choral ballad in triple time, "A little bird in the air," and the equally melodious and very impressive Epilogue "occur" only to a born melodist. But Mr. Elgar has also learned—and without any other teachers than the great masters—the valuable secret of presenting his ideas in the most effective manner. In fact, we know very few contemporary cantatas in which harmony, counterpoint, and orchestration are used with such freedom and force towards the one important end of making the music effective in the best sense of the term. Mr. Elgar employs Leitmotiven freely and with admirable judgment. He thinks nothing of using three or four together without being in the least hampered by such an embarras de richesses. They are frequently pregnant and expressive phrases which readily lend themselves to the process of metamorphosing, without which the use of the Leitmotive is apt to become but the veriest "dodge." He speaks out boldly when necessary and with a rugged strength which is at once stirring and bracing. Such numbers as the "Challenge of Thor" and the "Wraith of Odin," two of the most effective and impressive choruses of recent times, come with a melodic freshness and rhythmic swing truly delightful. Throughout the cantata the work given to the orchestra is of the most important description, so much so that in this respect "King Olaf" has very few equals in British music. Mr. Elgar does not hesitate to avail himself of almost every known orchestral device, and some splendidly sonorous as well as many highly picturesque or sensuously charming passages are the result. He employs a very full orchestra, and revels in the opportunities for writing accompaniments of symphonic importance which it offers. Thus there are movements—e.g., the above-mentioned choral ballad—in which the vocal parts are distinctly subordinate to the orchestra, and it was a pity that at the performance under notice the proper balance between the two was not obtained. That the work is open to some criticism cannot be gainsaid. The composer has still something to learn in regard to the declamation of the text, for which purpose he could not do better than study the works of Dr. Hubert Parry or Purcell. Then he does not exercise sufficient self-criticism when he selects from the wealth of the melodic material supplied by his facile imagination, some few phrases, especially for the solo voices, nearly approaching the trite. It may also be questioned whether a little more reticence in the orchestra here and there would not have added to the general effect by giving relief from the continual chatter of the wood-wind, the never-ending "effective little bits" for this or that instrument, when the ear and brain, surfeited with so much sonority, colour, and charm, almost demand a rest. But these are but trifles compared with the fine qualities to be found in what is in many respects a masterly work, which deserves and will doubtless obtain frequent hearings. The performance, conducted by Mr. Elgar, was, on the whole, good; the choir sang with vigour and enthusiasm, and evident appreciation of the fine though difficult music entrusted to them. The orchestra would have been all the better for a few more rehearsals; but the soloists, Mrs. Medora Henson, Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Andrew Black, were excellent.

On the afternoon of the 10th ult. Mr. Edward German conducted an excellent rendering of his spirited and graceful "Romeo and Juliet" suite. Special interest was excited by this first concert-room performance of the effective music, originally written for Mr. Forbes Robertson's revival of Shakespeare's play at the Lyceum Theatre, and many points were brought out at the Crystal Palace which might be naturally obscured at the Theatre. At the close the composer was recalled to the platform amidst well-deserved applause.

The last concert of the season, which fell on Easter Eve, was noteworthy for the absence of a symphony from the programme. There was, however, no lack of variety or interest in the scheme, which included Brahms's noble "Tragic" overture, the "Siegfried" Idyll, and Tschaïkowsky's romantic Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor, the solo in which was admirably played by the composer's gifted compatriot, M. Siloti. Minor pieces by Arensky and Rachmaninoff were given with excellent effect by the Russian pianist, and vocal solos and duets were contributed by the Misses Salter. The programme was completed by Auber's Overture to "Zanetta," Mr. Manns conducting throughout with his habitual animation.

PADEREWSKI CONCERT.

A memorable event in the musical performances of last month was the orchestral concert, with M. Paderewski as the soloist, which took place on the 9th ult., at the Queen's Hall. The great pianist was heard in two concertos, that by Schumann in A minor and Liszt's brilliant development of this form in E flat. M. Paderewski's reading of Schumann's beautiful work is fairly well known to the majority of music-lovers. It is more French than German in its vivacity, exquisite refinement, and subtle suggestiveness of expression; but it is an extremely fascinating interpretation, and there was good reason for the enthusiasm which it aroused on this occasion. A finer performance of Liszt's first concerto has probably never been heard. The virtuoso seemed to be in perfect sympathy with the varying moods of the music, and gave expression to each with the utmost intensity of feeling and executive brilliancy. No little of the effectiveness of M. Paderewski's playing on this occasion was due to the remarkable precision and faithfulness with which he was assisted by Mr. Henry Wood's magnificent orchestra, every change of tempo and gradation of force of tone, from the softest pianissimo to the loudest fortissimo, being followed and echoed with striking fidelity and sympathy. The remainder of the evening was occupied with an impressive interpretation of Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture, Tschaïkowsky's attractive and quaint "Casse-Noisette" suite, and Albert Barlow's clever orchestral arrangement of two of Brahms's Hungarian Dances.

QUEEN'S HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS.

Mr. Robert Newman concluded his enjoyable and excellent series of Saturday evening promenade concerts at the Queen's Hall, on the 10th ult., when the spacious arena was so packed that it was with difficulty that the majority of the listeners could raise their arms to read their programmes. The evening was opened with a fine performance of Beethoven's overture "Leonora" (No. 3), and the high standard of efficiency that Mr. Henry Wood's orchestra has attained was further shown in the subsequent rendering of M. Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," the interpretation of which very nearly approached in its precision and delicacy the memorable reading given of the fanciful work by M. Lamoureux in the same hall during his recent series of concerts. Mr. Edward German's fascinating Three Dances from his incidental music to Shakespeare's "Henry VIII." were played in a manner that roused the enthusiasm of the audience, which reached its climax after a spirited performance of the "Walkürenritt," a repetition of which was insisted upon. The novelties at the two preceding Concerts were, on March 27, the prelude to Paul Umlauft's opera "Evanthia," and, on the 3rd ult., a Concertstück for pianoforte and orchestra by Mr. G. W. F. Crowther. "Evanthia," it may be remembered, was bracketted with Mr. J. Forster's "Rose of Pontevedra" for the prize of 5,000 marks offered in 1894 by the late Duke of Saxe-Coburg for the best one-act opera. Mr. Umlauft's prelude, although written on Wagnerian lines, shows considerable originality of conception and workmanship, and in its entirety the piece is very acceptable music in the concert-room. Mr. Crowther's Concertstück consists of two connected movements based upon melodious themes which are developed in a musician-like and interesting manner. The pianoforte part was brilliantly played by the composer, and the work created a very favourable impression. The chief feature at this concert was, however, an impressive reading of Tschaïkowsky's Fifth Symphony in E, which was followed with a manifest enjoyment that would seem to indicate that this fine work will rival in popularity its magnificent companion, "The Pathetic." The vocalists have been Madame Marie Duma, Madame Marie Hooton, Miss Maggie Davies, and Messrs. Herbert Grover, Edward Branscombe, and Henry Piercy; and the instrumentalists who have appeared were Miss Ethel Spiller, Señor Arbos, and Mr. Percy Frostick (violinists), and Mr. Claude Hobday (double bass). The Concerts will be resumed on August 28 and will be continued nightly for seven weeks.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

We can now conclude the record of these entertainments for the thirty-ninth season. The most attractive features at the Saturday Concert on March 27 was Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins, superbly played by Lady Hallé and Dr. Joachim. Familiar concerted works by Beethoven were given, and Mr. Hugo Heinz sang Lieder by Schumann, Rubinstein, and Brahms fairly well. Another ordinary scheme, which need not detain us, was presented on the following Monday. Mention only need be made of the crisp and accurate rendering of Beethoven's not very interesting and rarely-played Sonata in F sharp major (Op. 78), by Miss Muriel Elliott, a gifted young pianist, who should be more frequently heard, and two of the picturesque and effective "Brautlieder" of Cornelius, which were artistically sung by Mrs. Hutchinson.

On Saturday, the 3rd ult., welcome variety was given to the proceedings by the first appearance of the celebrated Joachim Quartet from Berlin. These artists consist of the great Hungarian violinist, and Messrs. Kruse, Wirth, and Hausmann. The first and last-named are, of course, not strangers, but the second violin and the viola were new to London. Mr. Arthur Chappell acted wisely in securing this combination for the last four Concerts of the season, and he found his reward in largely increased audiences. In accordance with Continental custom, three quartets were played on the first two occasions, and there were songs, but no pianoforte solos. The works at the first performance were Beethoven's in B flat (Op. 18, No. 6), in F minor (Op. 95), and C sharp minor (Op. 131), thus illustrating in succession the master's three styles. After the first few bars it was fully apparent that the ensemble of the four artists was perfect. Dr. Joachim has, so to speak, impressed his idiosyncrasy on his fellow executants, and they play literally as "one man." The performance of the great work in C sharp minor was truly remarkable.

On Monday, the 5th ult., the quartets were Mozart's in E flat (No. 4), Brahms's in A minor (Op. 51, No. 2), and Beethoven's in B flat (Op. 130), a work in six movements, and the most genial of the so-called posthumous quartets. Madame Marchesi was the vocalist on both occasions, and sang with all her usual taste and warmth of expression, but was unwise in selecting Schumann's "Die beiden Grenadiere." Again, the piquant little song "Willst du dein Herz mir schenken" should not be attributed to Bach, who assuredly did not write it. At the final Saturday concert, on the 10th ult., Haydn's Quartet in G (Op. 17, No. 5), Beethoven's wonderful work in A minor (Op. 132), with the molto adagio in the Lydian mode, and Schumann's in A (Op. 41, No. 3) were presented. The vocalist was Miss Agnes Witting, who was more successful in Schubert's "Aufenthalt" and "Hark, hark, the lark," than in the same composer's "Die junge Nonne," which few singers can render with the needful measure of expression.

The concluding concert, on Monday, the 12th ult., was in every respect successful. It commenced with Beethoven's bright Quartet in A (Op. 18, No. 5), and the second concerted work was Brahms's terse and thoroughly intelligible String Quintet in G (Op. 111), in which the Joachim Quartet received excellent aid from Mr. Hobday as the second viola player. In Schumann's Quintet in E flat (Op. 44), Miss Fanny Davies resumed her place as the pianist, and a finer performance of this masterpiece has assuredly never been heard in London. Miss Ada Crossley, who was disabled by illness for some weeks, is now again in full possession of her vocal powers, and her pure contralto voice proved effective in airs by Asidi, Brahms, and Hubert Parry.

BACH'S "PASSION" AT ST. PAUL'S.

"The most profoundly solemn service that is held in the Cathedral throughout the year," records a recent writer in regard to the annual presentation of Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion in our Metropolitan Cathedral. It is now twenty-four years since this beautiful service was inaugurated, and the most recent rendering of the great cantor's noble music on the Tuesday in Holy Week retained all its old characteristics. As heretofore, the spirit of true devotion breathed upon the thousands of worshippers gathered together. Mere criticism is, therefore, quite out of place; but we cannot help referring to the remarkable rendering of the soprano and alto solos in the "Passion," which were sung à coro by all the Cathedral choristers in a manner deserving of the highest commendation. The phrasing, attack, refinement, quality of tone, as well as the perfect blending of the voices of these intelligent boys in their singing of Bach's difficult music, seemed to surpass all previous efforts, and reached a point of excellence of which they and their teachers may well be proud. The tenor and bass solos of the "Passion," sung by members of the Cathedral choir, were distributed between Messrs. Alfred Kenningham, George Stubbs, and William Davies (tenors); Messrs. Thomas Kempton, Harry Stubbs, Vernon Taylor, R. E. Miles, and C. E. Tinney (basses). Mr. Fred. Walker, as usual, accompanied the recitatives on a grand pianoforte; Mr. J. S. Kiddle (organist of Marylebone Parish Church) played the small organ placed near the pulpit; while the great organ was in the competent hands of Mr. Charles Macpherson, sub-organist of the Cathedral. Mr. G. H. Betjemann (the first violinist of the orchestra) played the violin obbligato to "Have mercy on me, O Lord"; and the whole service was under the experienced direction of Dr. Martin, the Cathedral organist. The new Bishop of London (Dr. Mandell Creighton) pronounced the Benediction. The following organ voluntaries were played by Mr. Charles Macpherson before the service: Introduction to Haydn's "Passion," Prelude to Rheinberger's Sonata in C minor, and the Finale of Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

ROYAL ARTILLERY BAND CONCERT.

The remarkable efficiency in the performance of elaborate orchestral compositions to which Cavalière L. Zavertal has brought his justly famed force was specially apparent at Queen's Hall, on March 26, when the programme was devoted to works by Schubert. In those lovely fragments known as the "Unfinished" Symphony both conductor and players developed an attention to expression that caused the two movements to be heard under highly favourable circumstances. The rendering was precise yet sympathetic, graceful yet never fantastic or strained in sentiment. Much the same may be said of the execution of the "Rosamunde" overture and the Entr'acte (No. 2). The band could not have been more alert or responsive. The lighter pieces diversifying the staple features were mostly if not entirely arrangements. They included the familiar "Ave Maria," a couple of marches, "Ungarischer" and "Reiter," the Serenade, and one of the best known "Momens Musicals," the dainty performance of the latter worthily evoking the enthusiasm of the audience. The band ably reproduced the spirit of each of these pieces. Cavalière Zavertal conducted with his accustomed tact and firmness.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

The thirty-sixth concert of the Westminster Orchestral Society took place on Wednesday evening, March 31, in the Westminster Town Hall, under the direction of Mr. Stewart Macpherson. The progress made by this association since its inauguration has been very gratifying, and although no novelties were produced on this occasion the performance was, from an artistic point of view, extremely successful. Hermann Goetz's lovely Symphony in F especially was well played. Mr. Walter Macfarren conducted a capital interpretation of his vigorous overture to "Othello," and M. Duloup gave a very effective performance of Max Bruch's beautiful Violin Concerto in G minor. Miss Jessie King was fairly satisfactory as the vocalist.

On Monday evening, the 5th ult., the Stock Exchange Orchestral Society gave its third subscription concert for the present season at the Queen's Hall. In the continued absence of Mr. George Kitchin, owing to his detention on the Continent through ill health, the concert was again ably directed by Mr. Arthur W. Payne. There was a trifling novelty—namely, a brief Suite in three movements, entitled "Norwegian Scenes," by Mr. Albert E. Matt, a trombone player whose name figures frequently in orchestral programmes. It is a pleasing little work and it was warmly received. Another little piece announced as "first time" was a "Berceuse" for strings by Mr. Louis H. Hillier, which made but little effect. Nor did Hans Huber's somewhat dry Pianoforte Concerto in C (Op. 36), though it was well played by Miss Agnes Zimmermann, who was the first to introduce it to a London audience at one of Mr. Henschel's London Symphony Concerts in 1886. The ballet airs from Gounod's "La Reine de Saba" and Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute" were included in the programme; and some well selected glees and part-songs were admirably rendered by the male voices, under the direction of Mr. S. G. Edwards. Encores were understood to be prohibited, but Madame Alice Gomez was permitted to accept one after singing Handel's "Lusinghe più care."

At the smoking concerts of the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society the programmes are generally of a lighter character than those when ladies are admitted, and a rule which must be regarded as distinctly uncomplimentary to the tastes of the male sex was not broken at the performance at the Queen's Hall on Friday, the 2nd ult. Mr. George Mount conducted the overture to "William Tell," some ballet movements from Massenet's opera "Le Cid," and an overture, "Mein Heim," by Dvorák, for the first time in England, but the last-named work did not create much impression. It should be heard again at an early opportunity. The violin solos contributed by Miss Irma Sethe and the well-selected songs rendered by Miss Thudichum and Mr. Kennerley Rumford were much appreciated.

CONCERTS AND RECITALS.

The second vocal recital given by Madame Blanche Marchesi, at St. James's Hall, on March 30, was a conspicuous artistic success. The gifted artist was in excellent voice, and her wonderful control over her vocal organs, in the matter chiefly of varying the tone colour in accordance with the sentiment of the words, was evinced in such selections as Gluck's "Divinités du Styx" and various other songs by Brahms, Schumann, Wagner, Widor, Chaminade, Fauré, and Charpentier. Madame Marchesi will certainly continue to attract large audiences; especially of young aspirants who desire to obtain what is necessary in the art of vocalization.

The concert given by Madame Frickenhaus at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, March 31, was well attended. This intelligent and well-trained English pianist opened with Brahms's fine Sonata in F minor (Op. 5), which was played with all needful vigour and expression, as well as technical accuracy. Groups of minor solos by Scarlatti, Chopin, Schumann, Richard Strauss, Sinding, Rubinstein, Brassin, and Dupont were interpreted with all the artistic qualities which the pieces demanded, and Mrs. Norman Salmond proved an admirable partner to Madame Frickenhaus in Saint-Saëns's brilliant Polonaise for two pianofortes (Op. 77). The concert was agreeably varied by the vocal contributions of Miss Aimée Ferdinand and Madame Zilla Harrison.

The programme of Miss Florence May's second pianoforte recital, in the Queen's Hall, on the afternoon of the 2nd ult., included Beethoven's rarely played Sonata in E flat (Op. 27, No. 1), and various pieces by Scarlatti, Brahms, and Chopin. Somewhat frigid at first, the young pianist warmed to her work and was most successful in the pieces by the Polish master.

A very successful chamber concert was given by Miss Doris Dalton, a clever young violinist, at St. James's Hall, on Friday afternoon, March 26. Excellent technique and style were shown in a sonata by Tartini and a concerto in A, by Mozart, played, of course, with pianoforte accompaniment, and some minor pieces. The pianoforte playing of Miss Fanny Davies and the vocal contributions of Mr. Kennerley Rumford were much appreciated.

Miss Elsie Hall, who gave a highly successful pianoforte recital at the Steinway Hall, on the 7th ult., is Australian by birth, but for some time she studied under Mr. John Farmer, of Harrow, and subsequently at the Berlin Hochschule, where she won the Mendelssohn Scholarship at Berlin against all the German competitors. Miss Hall at once proved her mastery over the keyboard by a delightfully clear and accurate rendering of Bach's "Partita" in G. Other pieces by various composers were interpreted with much intelligence, and the recital ended with an effective performance of Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata, in which the young pianist was associated with Mr. Kruse, the second violinist in the Joachim Quartet.

Mr. Philip Cathie gave his second and third violin recitals in the Queen's (Small) Hall, on the afternoons of Wednesday, March 31 and the 7th ult., with assistance from Miss Margaret Pierrepont, Mr. Bentley Cathie, Mr. John Walters, and Mr. Henry Piercy. Various works by Grieg, Max Bruch, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and other composers were included in the programmes, and Mr. Philip Cathie may be said to have firmly established himself as a violinist of the first rank in the favour of London amateurs.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The students of the Royal Academy of Music gave a commendable miscellaneous concert, on March 24, at the Imperial Institute. The choir sang Jensen's cantata "The Feast of Adonis," and the part-songs "More life" and "The Fairies," by Mr. Walter Macfarren, with praiseworthy precision; the male choir also rendered Mendelssohn's "Vintage Song" with admirable spirit. The beautiful quartet "Who goes home?" and the female chorus "The mistress we adore," from Sir A. C. Mackenzie's comic opera "His Majesty," were also effectively interpreted. Several pianoforte pieces were contributed by Miss Marguerite Elzy and some violin and violoncello solos were played in a promising manner by Miss Marjorie Hayward and Miss May Mukle. Songs were also effectively sung by Miss Jane Spicer and Mr. Robert Radford. Mr. H. R. Eyers conducted and Mr. C. F. Pollard was the accompanist.

On the 1st ult. the students gave their customary orchestral concert before the Easter holidays, at the Queen's Hall, under the conductorship of the Principal of the Institution. The most notable performance was the violin playing by Mr. P. H. Miles, who produces an excellent tone from his instrument and phrases with marked intelligence. Miss Marion White and Miss Elsie E. Horn gave proof of excellent training by their respective renderings of the pianoforte part of two movements from Scharwenka's Concerto in C minor (Op. 56) and Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor (Op. 25), and Miss May Mukle was the soloist in the Adagio and Finale from Dvorák's Violoncello Concerto (Op. 104). Mr. John T. Watkins and Mr. David Jones sang with considerable spirit the duet "The Lord is a Man of War," and the programme was concluded with the overture and introduction to Rossini's "William Tell."

The usual operatic performances took place, on the 3rd ult., at the Academy, when the bill consisted of the first and second acts of Donizetti's "Don Pasquale" and Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Cox and Box." The heroine of the first-named work was personated with considerable vivacity and vocal skill by Miss Isabel Jay, and the title rôle was sustained with much sense of humour by Mr. Haigh Jackson. The parts of the Doctor and Ernest were capably sustained by Mr. Robert Hyett and Mr. R. Whitworth Mitton respectively, and other characters were impersonated by Mr. Maengwyn Davies and Mr. Walter A. Reynolds. In "Cox and Box" the two lodgers were embodied in a meritorious manner by Messrs. W. A. Reynolds and R. W. Mitton, the pretty tenor voice of the last-named being advantageously heard in the graceful lullaby. Mr. E. M. Davies was an excellent Serjeant Bouncer, and the performance in its entirety reflected much credit on the director, Mr. Betjemann.

The following competitions have taken place during the past month: the Louisa Hopkins Memorial Prize, on the 2nd ult., awarded to Vera Margolies; the examiners highly commended Lily West and commended Regina Druiff. The Sterndale Bennett Prize, on the 3rd ult., awarded to Elsie E. Horne (London); the examiners highly commended Marion White. The Emile Sauret Prize, on the same day, awarded to Percy Hilder Miles (Erith), Edith Byford being very highly commended. The Charles Mortimer Prize (for composers), on the same day, awarded to Hubert G. Oke (London), Elsie E. Horne being highly commended and Stephen Champ commended.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

At the monthly meeting of the Musical Association, on the 13th ult., Dr. Annie W. Patterson read a paper on "The Distinctive Characteristics of Irish Music." The lecturer claimed great antiquity for Irish music, as it was "essentially harp music," and there was good reason to believe that the harp was the oldest of all musical instruments. A distinctive feature of Irish music was its rapid change of sentiment, which reflected a peculiarity of the character of the people. Poetry and music went hand in hand with the bards, who until the early part of the eighteenth century were held in great and widespread esteem. Consideration of the music of the bards brought us in touch with the music of Ireland of two hundred years ago. It should not be forgotten, however, that there was a great gulf between just intonation and the modern equal tempered scale, which altered to a certain degree the character of the ancient melodies. The oldest tunes seemed to be in the pentatonic scale. The sharp seventh was rarely met with in hundreds of old tunes. The lecturer did not think that the influence of the Church modes on Irish music was ever very great. Irish song was distinctly secular, and essentially a music of human emotion.

During the subsequent discussion Dr. Pearce, who presided, called attention to a paper read by Mr. Lacy before the Association, in which Irish music was divided into three periods, the earliest being the tunes written in the pentatonic scale, and the subsequent divisions being melodies which contained the leading seventh and sharp fourth respectively. Dr. Pearce also expressed his opinion that the prevalence at one time of the ecclesiastical tones must have affected Irish music. Mr. W. H. Cummings brought forward some good evidence to show that the ancient Irish scale was the same as that now in general use, and that in common with other countries where Church music had prevailed, the scale which formerly existed as we now had it was spoilt by the influence of the ecclesiastical modes. Ancient Irish music had to rest on tradition, and tradition was a sad story-teller.

STRATFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

No local musical event is of more interest to amateurs residing in the Eastern suburbs of the metropolis than this annual competition, extending over several days, at the Stratford Town Hall. At the fifteenth of these gatherings there was not the slightest indication of growing indifference. Over forty contests, beginning on the 1st ult., took place, and there were no fewer than 450 entries for the prizes offered for proficiency in nearly every branch of the art. The various competitions were closely followed, and in most of the classes a marked increase of ability was manifested. In the contest for choirs of equal voices, in which there were nine entries, the first prize was awarded to Bancroft's School, Woodford (conductor, Mr. J. E. Hall), and the second to the Forest Gate Collegiate School for Girls (conductor, Mr. G. B. Gilbert). Each body of singers taking part in the Elementary School Choirs competition (not more than fifty voices, every member under sixteen years) had to sing as test piece Franz Abt's "Softly roam, gentle night," and a piece chosen by the choir. The winner was Monteith Road (North Bow) Board School, the conductor of which is Mr. Edwin A. Price. The prize for choral societies of not more than seventy voices went to Bethnal Green Library (conductor, Mr. J. J. Cole). In hymn-tune composition Mr. E. A. Price (Victoria Park) was winner, and Mr. J. H. Morre (Poplar) gained the part-song prize. Some of the pianoforte and vocal contests were exceedingly keen. In the special competitions for past festival prize-winners, whether amateur or professional vocalists, gold medals were assigned to Miss Eugenie Frank (Leyton) and to Mr. A. M. Borwell (Clapton), and Mr. Stephen Champ (Stratford) received a similar award for pianists. The adjudicators included such well-known musicians as Mr. H. C. Banister, Dr. Creser, Mr. Eaton Faning, Mr. Tobias A. Matthay, and Mr. Visetti. In all respects the festival was a distinct success, and reflected great credit upon the business capabilities of Mr. John Graham, the indefatigable secretary.

REVIEWS.

The Flag of England. Ballad for Soprano Solo, Chorus, and Orchestra. Words by Rudyard Kipling. Music by J. Frederick Bridge. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This work, which is, by permission, dedicated to the Queen, and is to be performed on the 6th inst. at the Albert Hall, is one of the most important compositions which the forthcoming celebrations have caused to be written. The text possesses the virility common to Mr. Kipling's poems, and its contrasts and picturesque suggestiveness render it peculiarly suitable to musical illustration. The portion of the poem which Professor Bridge has so dramatically set to music opens with the demand, "What is the flag of England? Winds of the world, declare!" To which answer is made in characteristic fashion, from the North, South, East, and West. The question, "What is the flag of England?" is several times repeated in the course of the poem, and is set to a bold diatonic phrase, which is deftly made to impart unity to the music. The soprano soloist first makes the interrogation, preceded by only two bars of instrumental introduction, and this direct opening is well calculated to fix the attention of the listener and to suggest the vigorous and lucid style of musical expression which proves to be the most distinguishing features of the work. The reply of the North Wind is set to music of rhythmic force and sustained energy that admirably reflect the ruthless sentiment of the words. The South speaks next, and its milder utterances provide an opportunity for contrast of which the composer has made effective use. It is opened by a melodious solo for the soprano vocalist, who is subsequently supported by the female voices of the choristers in four parts, the tenors and basses being cleverly introduced with dramatic effect towards the close of the number. Several highly imaginative passages also occur in the answer of the East Wind, which contains some of the most effective part-writing of the work. The song of the West Wind begins more graciously, but it soon loses its suave character, and its sentiment is sympathetically followed by the music, and, by breaking into cleverly arranged eight-part vocal harmony, Professor Bridge brings his work to a thrilling and imposing conclusion. Choral conductors should make an early acquaintance of this patriotic ballad, which is not only peculiarly appropriate to the present period, but, from the nature of its text, will be always seasonable as long as Englishmen are proud of the associations of their National Standard.

The Literature of Music. By James E. Matthew. [London: Elliot Stock.]

This useful book, one of "The Book-Lover's Library" series, is industriously compiled by an expert who is the fortunate possessor of a library containing upwards of 4,200 books on musical literature! The dainty volume is divided into twelve chapters, ranging from "The literature of ancient music" to the "Bibliography of music," through all of which the author conducts the reader in an easy, pleasant manner, chatting as he goes along about the many musical books of which he gives the titles. It is a question whether a strict chapter classification is an unmixed advantage. For example, Adolphe Jullien's valuable monographs on Berlioz and Wagner are placed under "The literature of the opera" and do not appear at all under "Biography," and there are no cross references. The index does not meet this difficulty, as neither of the above books are indexed under the two composers' names. Some omissions in Mr. Matthew's list are naturally to be expected in a first edition. Such an invaluable book of reference as Herr Alfred Dörffel's "Festschrift zur hundertjährigen Jubelfeier der Einweihung des Concertsaales im Gewandhause zu Leipzig, 1781-1881," should have been included, as also a similar historical work by Hanslick on the Vienna concerts. There is no list of musical newspapers; and Miss C. Bell (p. 133) should be Mrs. C. Bell. We give a cordial welcome to this interesting and companionable little volume.

The Banner of Saint George. Ballad for Chorus and Orchestra. The words written by Shapcott Wensley. The music composed by Edward Elgar.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This ballad, written with a view to the Jubilee Celebrations, relates the deed of fame of St. George—Patron Saint of England. Mr. Elgar has approached his work in a similar spirit to that which dictated the style of his setting of "Scenes from the Saga of King Olaf." There is the same facility of melodic invention, keen perception of the dramatic elements in the libretto, and picturesque modes of expression. There is genuine pathos in the opening chorus of lamentations, to which admirable contrast is provided by the strains which announce the appearance of the princess and relate her words of hope. These are set in unison for the sopranos, who thus are provided with many grateful and charming passages. The music grows more dramatic as St. George approaches and the subsequent scenes are worked up in stirring fashion. St. George speaks by the tenors and basses, also in unison, and in musical phrases as bold as his words. Excitement increases with the appearance of the dragon, and the climax is reached by the victory of the knight. The choral parts in this descriptive number are cleverly designed to secure the required effects by the simplest means, and although the music demands precision and emphasis in delivery, it will present no difficulty to a fairly cultured choir. The epilogue is set in march form, and is of a remarkably broad and dignified character. The first subject is a theme that once heard is not easily forgotten, and its companions are no less excellent and appropriate; the movement in its entirety concludes the work in a most effective manner.

A Practical Treatise on the Art of Phrasing. By Gordon Saunders. [A. Hammond and Co.]

Correct phrasing in music is so important, and there are comparatively so few books on the subject, that the appearance of Dr. Saunders's work will doubtless be welcomed by many earnest-minded musicians. The book, as its title implies, has manifestly been written to supply the wants of the average amateur, and not only comprises instruction on the principles of phrasing intelligently, but also embraces fingering and the proper performance of embellishments. The explanations, as far as they go, are terse and clear; but it is to be regretted that, except in a few instances, no indication is given of the source from whence the 350 musical examples are derived. This is especially an oversight in the portion devoted to embellishments, for no little of the individuality of style of the great masters is contained in their use of certain ornamental forms, and their proper performance is frequently dependent on a knowledge of the composer in whose writings they occur. Fortunately, however, in this particular, the student has Mr. Dannreuther's monumental work on "Musical Ornamentation." In Part II., on "Fingering," the author adopts what he incorrectly terms the "English" system, with the + for the thumb, and which he maintains is a better method than indication by the first five numerals. However this may be, it is distressing to be told that "some foreign publishing firms are re-issuing musical works with English fingering." In the good cause of unanimity such firms should be written to, and Dr. Saunders may be referred to The Musical Times for 1890, page 78.

The Magician. An original humorous children's Operetta. The libretto written by Louis B. Tisdale. The music composed by A. L. Vingoe. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The story of this pleasing little operetta is a very simple one, and is chiefly concerned with a practical joke played by some village children upon a magician, who in revenge mesmerises them, but finally invites them to his entertainment at the local town hall. The libretto, which contains nine principal parts and five smaller ones, includes some brightly written dialogue and humorous lyrics. The last-named have been set in an appropriately melodious manner, and several of the vocal numbers would provide instructive practice in rhythm. The pianoforte accompaniment might be made very effective by a tasteful pianist, and if, as suggested, the characters adopted Watteau dresses, some very picturesque tableaux would be presented.

Famous Violinists and Fine Violins. By Dr. T. L. Phipson. [Chatto and Windus.]

The author of this book is one of that numerous class of distinguished amateurs who may be termed musical doctors of medicine. In this instance, seeing that the author asked for a violin at the age of six, and early showed remarkable aptitude for music, and that his father was a worshipper at the shrine of St. Cecilia, it is somewhat surprising that the child was not brought up for the musical profession; but although another walk in life was decided upon, Master Phipson seems to have had good music teachers, and, judging from what he says, to have developed into an esteemed violinist and expert of the value of old violins. The book is written in a pleasant chatty style, and although most of the serious matter is to be found more exhaustively treated in Grove's "Dictionary of Music" and in Mr. Hart's work on the violin, Dr. Phipson's volume contains much that will prove attractive to amateurs, notably that which refers to "The secret of Paganini," which Dr. Phipson claims to have discovered. The skill pertaining to the novelist is shown in the manner in which the reader is led to read many pages before the "secret" is revealed, and which ultimately is found to be of a two-fold nature, being attributed to Paganini always writing "solo music in the keys best suited to the violin" and to the manner of his producing harmonics. The latter, the author says, "were played on the bridge, Sul ponticello; he indicates them in the score by the word 'armonioso,' and he has unintentionally let out the secret in his wonderful piece, 'La Stregghe' (The Witches), but nobody seemed hitherto to have discovered it. He had acquired a wonderful dexterity in this respect, and these harmonic tones can be played even a little distance from the bridge. By long practice a stroke of the bow can be acquired that will produce the harmonics of the notes stopped by the fingers. It is not, in this case, the finger, but the bow that rests lightly on the strings, to produce the harmonic effect. It is often more surprising than agreeable. In this way he played the passages in double harmonics in all his pieces where they are indicated, and the curious echo effects in the Rondo de la Clochette and the Carnaval de Venise."

Notable Welsh Musicians of to-day. By Frederic Griffith
[Francis Goodwen.]

"Gallant little Wales" makes a brave show in this daintily bound volume of living musicians of Welsh nationality. The book is divided into four sections, which are severally devoted to biographical notices of composers, vocalists, instrumentalists, and conductors—portraits of each person mentioned accompanying the letterpress. These notices comprise nine composers, forty-three singers, eighteen instrumentalists, and fourteen conductors; the second division containing by far the largest number of well-known artists. In an excellent preface an earnest protest is made against the unsatisfactory state of musical knowledge in the Principality, and it is declared that "in the most active musical centres in the Principality the great classical masterpieces are practically unknown; in fact, classical music is seldom performed at all; the art, as art, is almost totally unstudied." The cause is boldly attributed to the inartistic nature of the Eisteddfod, which it is declared "must change its course of action." "Why," it is reasonably asked, "do we not have competitions for sight reading? That would, at any rate, stamp the victors as being better musicians than their opponents." It is very satisfactory to find Mr. Griffith writing so plainly to his countrymen, for he has gained a position in the musical world which is calculated to give force to his words and help to convince those upon whom the responsibility rests that "a more whole-hearted and less circumscribed devotion to music will bring to the people of Wales its own reward."

Wagner's Heroes. Wagner's Heroines. By Constance Maud. [Edward Arnold.]

"These stories are for little people, and are not written for Wagnerites or any other learned persons." So run the opening lines of the preface to the first of these volumes. Perusal of them, however, shows that grown-up "little people" may read them with advantage, and that they may ith confidence be placed in the hands of "the daughters f the house." Moreover, although "not written for Vagnerites," they would do well to buy them, for therein ill be found a way to explain certain peculiarities of pro-edure on the part of some of Wagner's characters which e startling to the unsophisticated mind. The authoress, fact, has related the sayings and doings of Parsifal, Hans achs, Tannhäuser, and Lohengrin, Brünnhilde, Senta, and olde, not only with a deftness that is "void of offence," it in a manner which strongly accentuates the great moral uths which underlie all myths and legends. Another pur-se which these volumes serve is to enable their readers to llow with greater power of appreciation the stage repre-ntations of Wagner's operas and music-dramas. Interest their principal characters is indeed much increased by e relation of more concerning them than Wagner found nvenient for his dramatic purposes. Thus we are told of ans Sachs's youthful days, and Parsifal's visit to the ourt of King Arthur before he found the home of the nights of the Holy Grail; and in dealing with the lives of e heroines, Wagner's ideal of womanhood, superlative lf-sacrifice and devotion, is clearly set forth.

Punch and Judy. A Comic Operetta for children. The ords written by Bernard Page. The music composed by rthur Richards. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THERE are many histories of Punch's misdoings. ccording to the argument of this gay little operetta, the pirits of Punch's victims haunt him as Marionettes, and ne of them, a Clown, is the ghost of a former admirer of udy, whom it is stated "she still loves dearly but cannot arry till she dies." This is an incident in Judy's life which e do not remember having heard of before, and of the uthenticity of which we are doubtful; but it is justified by its ading to the production of a humorous duet in which Judy nd the Clown make satisfactory arrangements for matri-onial happiness when she is dead. It will be observed that ne author preserves the integrity of Judy's character by mitting all calculations based upon her husband's death. In n effective little song Punch candidly admits the aggressive riginality of his past deeds, and in a subsequent number he akes the occasion of Judy's mild flirtation with her hostly lover the cause for the realisation of her matrimonial opes. Part II. opens with a chorus of lamentation by the larionettes for Judy's untimely end, for which, however, onsolation is found in the declaration that "She soon will e happy and merry once more, and will join our excitable hrong. With wriggle and giggle, and flop on the floor, In a apture of laughter and song." In a neatly written song with horus Punch gives expression to his fears and torments, his number being effectively contrasted by a duet between udy and the Clown, who have comfortably settled down n Shadowland. Judy, however, still cherishes her wifely uties towards Punch, and exhorts him to repent; but Punch eclares that there is "No need to mope, For while there's ife, There's also hope." So the Marionettes, with the aid of Jack Ketch, execute the extreme rigour of the law on unch, and conclude the operetta with a gay bridal horus. The music is simple and melodious, and admirably daptated to the limited abilities of those for whom the work s designed. Four principal characters are required, who ave also small speaking parts. The scene is the interior of marionette show, which could be very easily represented by he aid of a few curtains, and, with a little skill, the dresses night be made very effective.

Novello's Parish Choir Book. Nos. 292-297. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IF demand and supply regulate each other the rapid rowth of the above-named publication can be easily under-tood. We have on our table a large number of new issues, hose now to be mentioned constituting only a small nstalment. The first embodies a curious but happy idea. t is "The Church Catechism" put in metrical form for inging as hymns, written by the Right Rev. Bishop Jenner and Annabel Jenner, and set to music by Myles B. Foster. The hymns are ten in all and the words of course uggest the teaching of the Catechism in the Book of Common Prayer. Simplicity, allied with musicianly feeling, characterises the hymns, which for the most part may be sung either in four parts or in unison. No. 293 is a clever arrangement in four parts of Barnby's spirited setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, from the unison Service in C. It is transposed to D, and on paper it looks very effective in its new shape. The next three numbers consist of the Morning and Evening Canticles in chant form, by James Turle, in the sober and devotional style of Church music so justly associated with the late organist of Westminster Abbey. The last for the present is a setting of the Benedictus in the key of F, by Bruce Steane. This is written in what may be called the chaste and sober style of English church music, but there are traces of modern tendencies in the harmonies. No solo voices are imperative.

Judex. From "Mors et Vita." Composed by Charles Gounod. Arranged as a Quintet for pianoforte and stringed instruments by Berthold Tours. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS is No. 8 of Messrs. Novello's excellent Albums for Pianoforte and Stringed Instruments, which are well calculated to cultivate music in the home. The present arrangement is for first and second violins, viola, violoncello, and pianoforte, and the parts are so ingeniously written that any one or all of the string parts, with the exception of that of the first violin, may be omitted without disturbing the completeness of the composition, although it is most satisfactory when all the instruments indicated are employed. The broad and dignified character of the music is well accentuated in this arrangement, which forms an effective piece of moderate difficulty.

Novello's Octavo Edition of Two-part Songs. Nos. 104-107. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

HERE we have four Spring songs, written and composed by Ethel M. Boyce, for female or boys' voices, two-part writing being solely employed. They are all delightful little lyrics and it is impossible to give the preference to any one of them. The voice parts are charmingly varied and the pianoforte accompaniments are piquant and pretty.

Graceful Dance. From the cantata "The Hours." Composed by J. L. Roeckel. Arranged for violin and pianoforte by Berthold Tours. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

YOUNG violinists in search of a simple and graceful little piece may be recommended to try Mr. Roeckel's "Graceful Dance," the pianoforte accompaniment of which may be entrusted without anxiety to be read at sight by a pianist of very moderate abilities.

Longmans' Music Course. By T. H. Bertenshaw (Longmans). This comprehensive book is divided into Elements of Music, Harmony and Counterpoint, Rhythm, Analysis, and Musical Form. The author, one of the masters at the City of London School, is not only a sound musician, but an expert educationalist, and his book bears upon every page evidences of much careful thought.——Introduction to the Study of Theory. By Franklin Petersen (Augener). A smaller theoretical treatise by a well-known Edinburgh musician, which will doubtless make its way. "I ForGet" is the author's somewhat paradoxical mnemonic for remembering the order of the Italian, French, and German sixths, which we hope his pupils, whatever their nationality, will not forget.——A Popular Account of Ancient Musical Instruments. By William Lynd (James Clarke and Co.). A cheap, useful, interesting, and fully illustrated little book, describing about 300 early instruments in the Galpin collection, all of which are said to be "in a perfect state of preservation, and what is still more remarkable, each contrivance [sic] is in playing condition."——A Protest against the modern development of Unmusical Tone. By Thomas C. Lewis (Chiswick Press). A pamphlet on "unmusical tone in organs, church bells, and pianofortes," by an eminent organ builder and expert on the subject.——Music at the Queen's Accession. By J. Spencer Curwen (Curwen). A reprint of the interesting lecture recently delivered by the author at the Society of Arts and at the London Institution.

MUSIC IN BELFAST.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The concert season may be said to have closed here on the 10th ult., when the twenty-second and last of the Saturday night series was given in the Ulster Hall. The season has been an exceptionally successful one, the standard having been considerably raised in the matter of so-called popular music, with the result that more than once the utmost capacity of the building was taxed and even money turned away from the doors. Mr. Louis Mantell, under whose direction these Concerts have been given, has announced that next season, in addition to still further improving the Saturday night series, he intends giving five grand subscription concerts, for which he hopes to procure the best available talent, vocal and instrumental.

The Philharmonic Society during the past season has more than sustained its reputation as one of the first societies in Ireland. In addition to the always popular "Elijah," Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust" has been given once again and Handel's "Messiah" has been performed twice to crowded houses.

Dr. Lawrence Walker has also contributed to the season's activity in things musical by his three classical chamber concerts, in which he has been assisted by Herr Theodore Werner (solo violin), Herr Bash (solo violoncello), Miss Winifred Burnell, Miss McKisack, and others, and it is pleasing to record that the attendance was commensurate with the programme and performers.

On Palm Sunday and Good Friday full choral and orchestral services were held in St. George's Parish Church, when Gaul's Passion Service was given, the solos being sung by Mr. George Benson, Mr. James Loyal, and Master MacIlwaine, Mr. Edgar Haines leading the orchestra, and Mr. J. F. A. R. Neil, the deputy-organist, presiding at the organ. The entire service was most impressively rendered, under the talented conductorship of Dr. W. G. Price.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

The first choral rehearsal in connection with this year's musical festival took place on the 12th ult., under the most favourable auspices. The choristers number 363 in all, consisting of 110 sopranos, 81 contraltos, 80 tenors, and 92 basses, of whom 124 are new singers. Dr. Heap, the newly appointed choirmaster, received quite an ovation.

One of the principal musical events of our busy musical season is Miss Fanny Davies's annual concert. This occurred on the 1st ult., when our gifted townswoman, as on many previous occasions, had again for her coadjutor Dr. Joachim; Mr. W. E. Whitehouse, in the absence, through illness, of Signor Piatti, made his début in Birmingham at this concert. The artistic personnel was further strengthened by the first appearance here of Mr. Alfred Gibson, the viola player. With such a combination of artists, Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in G minor (Op. 25) was in safe hands, and a finer and more intellectual rendering of this inspired work has not been given in this city. The programme was altogether an exemplary one, and included Beethoven's Sonata for pianoforte and violin in A major (Op. 30, No. 1), Schumann's "Kreisleriana" (Op. 16), pianoforte pieces by Mendelssohn, Schubert, and Diémer, Bach's Sarabande and Bourrée for violin, Saint-Saëns's "Le Cygne" and an Allegro Appassionata for violoncello.

An interesting and somewhat novel concert was given by the Birmingham Amateur Orchestral Society, in the Town Hall, on the 8th ult. The chief interest lay in the first representation here of Felicien David's descriptive symphonic ode "The Desert," one of the finest examples of the French school of fifty years ago. The spoken lines were delivered with impressiveness by Miss Lilian Hovey, who also sang the chant of the Muezzin with characteristic effect. Mr. George Halford conducted with care and judgment. The solo vocalists were Mr. Henry Stokes and Mr. Harry Burman.

Mr. J. W. Turner's English Opera Company has given a short operatic season at the Grand Theatre. The operas presented were "Faust," "The Bohemian Girl," "The Rose of Castile," "Il Trovatore," "Maritana," and "Sonnambula."

The musical matinées in connection with the Royal Birmingham Society of Artists' Spring Exhibition were inaugurated on the 3rd ult., when an excellent concert was given under Mr. Oscar Pollack's direction. The matinées will be continued weekly until the end of the season.

The Midland Musical Society gave its customary performance of Gounod's "Redemption," at the Town Hall, on Good Friday. Mr. H. M. Stevenson was the conductor and Mr. Perkins presided at the organ.

A rare and most valuable collection of original autograph letters and portions of manuscripts written by famous composers, musicians, singers, &c., was acquired last month by a well-known local collector. This magnificent collection comprises over 148 letters, manuscripts, portraits, &c., appertaining to various celebrities. Particularly interesting were the examples by Bach, Beethoven, and Wagner. The two pages of manuscript music by Johann Sebastian Bach contain the first number of the capriccio "Upon the departure of a beloved brother." The Beethoven relic consists of a letter signed during his last illness and two pages of manuscript music sketches, authenticated by Haslinger, of Vienna. There is a letter of Wagner's, also manuscript music from one of his opera scores. Of great interest are the letters and musical manuscripts of Schumann, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Paganini, Dibdin, Orlando Gibbons, Rubinstein, and Liszt.

The West Midland Federation of Evangelical Free Churches held a choir competition in the Town Hall on the 19th ult. The test piece in the three classes was Sullivan's "O love the Lord." Mr. E. Minshall was the adjudicator. In the evening a most successful choral festival was held, also in the Town Hall, when thirty choirs from Birmingham and the district, numbering 900 voices, rendered an interesting programme, which included Barnby's national song "Victoria," in a praiseworthy manner. Mr. Thomas Facer proved an excellent conductor, and the organ was safe in the hands of Mr. C. W. Perkins.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Stainer's "Crucifixion," which fully maintains its popularity in Bristol, was sung during Lent by several choral societies and in many churches, among them being St. Paul's (Portland Square), Redcliffe (where the work was first heard in Bristol), and St. Andrew's. Gounod's "Gallia" and Mendelssohn's "As the hart pants" were given in the Church of St. Mary, Tyndall's Park, on the 8th ult.

The Society of Bristol Gleemen, the second largest and best male-voice choir in our city, paid a visit to Newport on March 25, and sang to a numerous and delighted audience a number of familiar glees and part-songs.

Considerable interest was manifested in the third festival of the Bristol South Nonconformist Choirs' Association, which took place on March 31.

The Clifton Amateur Orchestral Society gave its annual concert on March 31, and displayed, by its performances (under the direction of Mr. Edward Pavey) of the overtures to Weber's "Preciosa" and Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," and other works, very marked improvement.

At the last popular chamber concert of the season, on the 3rd ult., the chief work in the programme was Tschaïkowsky's Pianoforte Trio (Op. 50), played by Messrs. Milani, Parsons, and E. Pavey. The vocalist was Mr. Arthur Walenn.

The Bristol Society of Instrumentalists brought its season's work to a close, on the 14th ult., by an open rehearsal. A good assemblage listened with evident pleasure to Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, Reissiger's "Felsenmuhle" overture, and Haydn's Symphony, No. 2, in D, which were capitally performed under the direction of Mr. George Riseley.

Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was given on the 12th ult. by the City Road Choral Society. It was rather ambitious

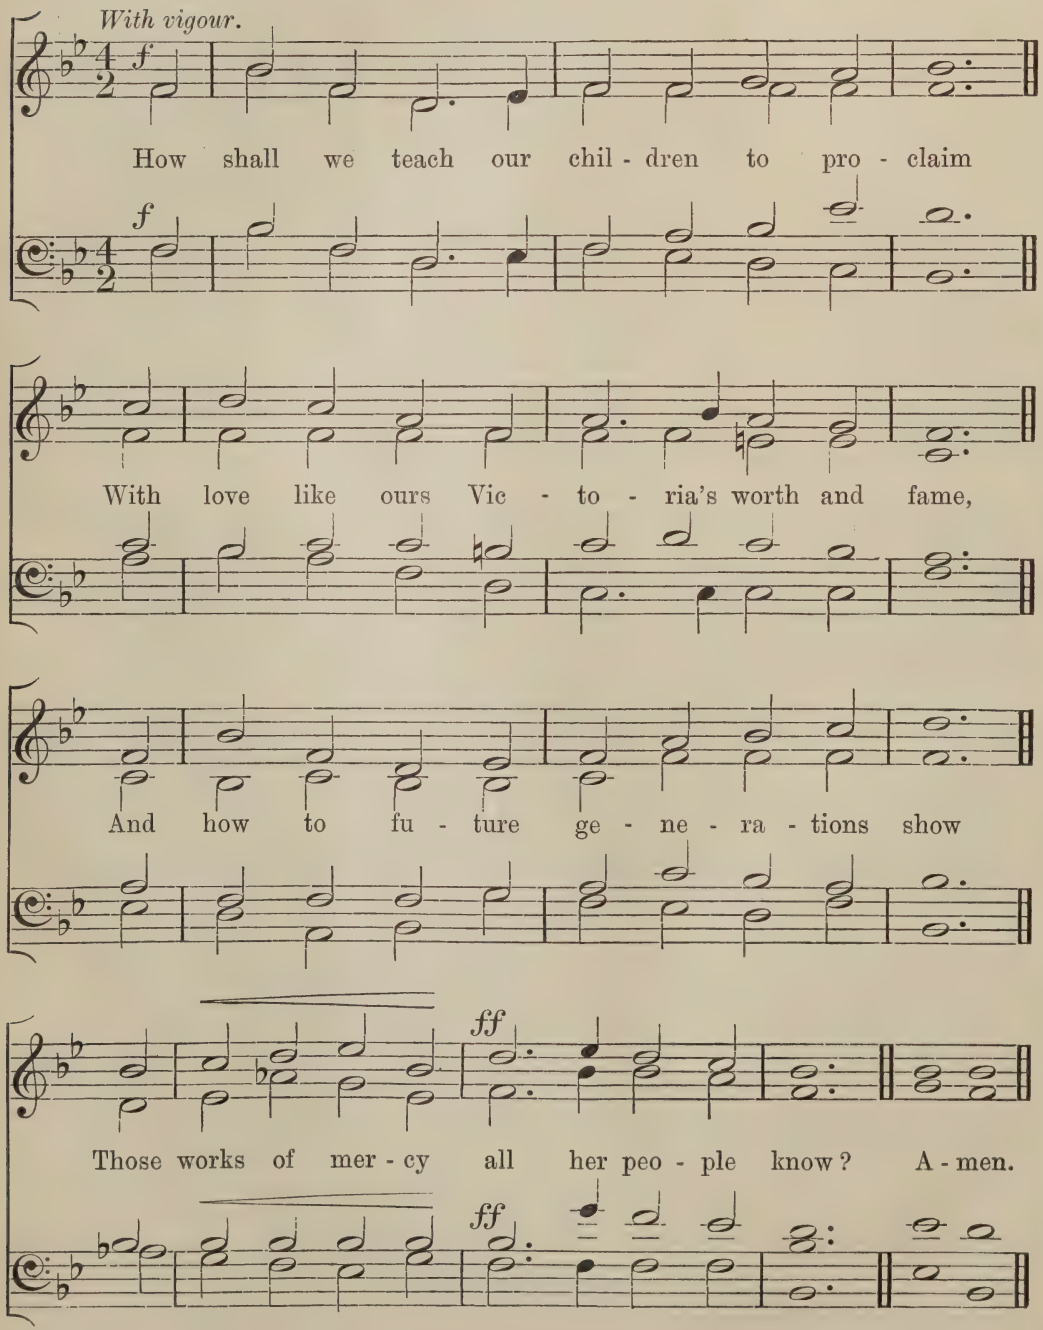
How shall we teach our Children



HYMN IN COMMEMORATION OF

Queen Victoria's Nurses

THE WORDS WRITTEN BY S. REYNOLDS HOLE (DEAN OF ROCHESTER)

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

GEORGE C. MARTIN.

Copyright, 1897, by Novello, Ewer and Co.

"Queens shall be thy nursing-mothers."—Isaiah xlix.

"I will seek that which was lost, and I will bind up that which was broken, and I will strengthen that which was sick."—Ezekiel xxxiv.

How shall we teach our children to proclaim
With love like ours Victoria's worth and fame,
And how to future generations show
Those works of mercy all her people know?

Shall the historian or the poet's song
Those deeds perpetuate and their praise prolong?
Shall art on canvas or in sculpture trace
For aye the records of that royal grace?

Brief while those annals in man's mind remain,
Years dim the picture and the marble stain:—
Whence shall the living presence then appear,
To act and speak, that all may see and hear?

She, whom we honour most, shall make reply,
Her works unto her wish shall testify,—
What was her choice, and what the end she sought,
With all that gold* her subject sisters brought?

Queen though she was, Christ's servant, and His zeal
The poor to comfort, and the sick to heal,
Glowed in her heart, and at her sweet command
"Victoria's Nurses" came to bless the land.

In lonely cottage, and in crowded street,
Where pain and nakedness and hunger meet,
They bring sure comfort to the sore oppress'd,
Strength to the weak and to the weary rest.

As yet but few, though all who know commend,
Shall we not seek their empire to extend?
Till thousand thousands bless the day they came,
Those royal nurses in Victoria's name.

And, through the ages, that dear word shall tell
To poor sick folk of one who loved them well,
With words of hope, such as an angel brings
With God's own glory on his golden wings. Amen.

for so young a body to attempt a work of such magnitude, but if the results were not in every respect what might be desired, they were at least praiseworthy.

Cheddar and Axbridge Choral Society gave commendable representations of Spohr's "Last Judgment," on the 5th and 6th ult., at the two towns from which the body derives its name.

Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" was performed by the Chipping Sodbury Choral Society on the 5th ult.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

"Judas Maccabæus" was performed by the St. Patrick's Past Choristers' Society, at the Antient Concert Rooms, on March 31, under the direction of Mr. Chas. G. Marchant, with full band and choir of 150 performers. Miss Agnes Treacy, a débutante, displayed sweetness, fluency, and good taste in her rendering of the solo soprano music, and Miss McConnell, Mr. R. G. Matthews, and Mr. T. Aylmer Kelly were successful in their several solos. The band and choir showed an advance upon its performance of last year, and the Cathedral boys deserve a word of special praise for their bright opening of "See the conquering hero comes." Mr. P. J. Griffith led the strings.

The Dublin Musical Society gave a Jubilee Commemoration concert on the 8th ult. The attractive programme was made up of Beethoven's "Engedi," Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," Gounod's "By Babylon's wave," Sullivan's "Light of the World" Symphony, Handel's "Zadok the Priest," &c. Dr. Joseph Smith conducted, and the principal vocalists were Madame Marie Duma, Mr. Otto Dene, and Mr. Thomas Marchant. Mr. Horan was organist, and Mr. A. Darley leader of the band.

A performance of Mozart's Twelfth Mass and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" took place in the Town Hall, Kingstown, on the 12th ult., with full band and chorus. The principal singers were Mrs. McNevin, Mrs. Werner, Miss Frengley, Miss McConnell, Misses K. and D. Byrne; Messrs. A. Manning, R. McNevin, Junr., L. Mooney, and J. P. Kelly. Mr. P. Goodman directed, and Mr. F. Manly presided at the organ.

The last chamber music recital for the season was given in the Royal Dublin Society's New Theatre, on Monday, the 5th ult., when Beethoven's Serenade Trio in D (Op. 8), Grieg's Sonata in C minor (Op. 45) for pianoforte and violin, and Dvorák's Pianoforte Quintet in A major (Op. 31) were performed. The Royal Dublin Society deserves well of the musical public for organising and subsidising these recitals. During the several years of their existence their influence for good has been manifest in the improved taste of the young instrumentalists, who are increasing both in numbers and ability. The executants during the series have been Signor Papini, first violin; Mr. Arthur Darley, second violin; M. Octave Grisard, viola; Herr Bast, violoncello; and Signor Esposito, pianoforte.

Among the Holy Week services deserving of mention were Bach's "Passion Music," at St. Patrick's Cathedral, directed by Mr. Marchant; Mercadante's "Seven Last Words," at St. Francis Xavier's, by Mr. Goodman; Stainer's "Crucifixion," at St. Mathias', by Dr. Figgis; Casciolini's "Tenebræ," at St. Andrew's, by Mr. Seymour; Spohr's "Calvary," at Rathfarnham; and Gounod's "Seven Last Words," at University Chapel, by Mr. Leahy.

MUSIC IN DUNDEE.

At the second concert of the Dundee Amateur Choral Union, on March 30, "Israel in Egypt" was given, and, considering the lack of orchestral accompaniment and professional soloists, the performance deserves great praise. Mr. David Stephen, as conductor (in the unavoidable absence of Mr. Carl D. Hamilton), and Mr. Collinson, of Edinburgh, as organist, acquitted themselves admirably.

The Dundee Orchestral Society gave the second concert of the season on the 2nd ult., under the conductorship of Mr. A. M. Stoole. The first part of the programme was devoted to the works of local musicians, and had, therefore, a special interest for Dundee concert-goers. The compositions, which were of great merit, were by Messrs. A. M. Stoole, R. O. Stoole, J. M. Smieton, David Stephen, and W. F. W. Jackson. The soloists were Miss Jane L. Moir and Mr. Richard (vocalists), Miss Louie Heath (pianist), and Mr. A. M. Stoole (violinist).

Two interesting historical organ recitals were given by Mr. David Stephen, in St. Leonard's School, St. Andrew's, on March 13 and 27. The first recital included works from the time of Buxtehude to Mendelssohn, the second from Mendelssohn to present-day composers, and both recitals were greatly appreciated by large audiences.

The Carnoustie Choral Union, under the conductorship of Mr. Edward Mason, concluded its recent season, on March 24, with a performance of Dr. Roland Rogers's prize cantata "The Garden" and a miscellaneous selection. The soloists were Miss E. Thomson, Mr. W. S. Hamilton, and Mr. A. H. Mitchell. The choruses were well sung, and the band was assisted by Mr. J. Adamson at the pianoforte and Mr. J. Burrows at the harmonium.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

The annual performance of "The Messiah," initiated sixteen years ago by Drs. Bunnett and Hill, took place in St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich, on Good Friday afternoon, in the presence of a very large audience. The profits were, as usual, devoted to local charities, and as the Norwich Festival Choir and the Philharmonic Societies' Band give their services, the expenses are reduced to a minimum. The vocal quartet comprised Miss Blanche Powell, Miss Lilian Hovey, Mr. Reginald Brophy, and Mr. A. H. Gee. Dr. Hill conducted and Dr. Bunnett presided at the organ.

On Good Friday evening a sacred concert was given, in Norwich, by the Working Girls' Orchestral Band, conducted by Mr. A. F. Howlett, which proved a source of pleasure to a large concourse of people. The programme included violin, cornet, auto-harp, and tubephone solos, interspersed with vocal and instrumental selections. It will be understood that the music was of a popular character, but the quality of the work done was a proof that the conductor's self-denying efforts are producing good results.

The choir of the Unthank Road Baptist Church, Norwich, assisted by friends, gave Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," on the 13th ult., under the direction of its organist, Mr. W. L. Palmer. The solos were sung by Miss Martha Mase, Mrs. G. W. Warner, and Mr. H. Brummage, while the accompaniments were given by a fairly complete band, led by Mr. W. Johnson.

The Bury St. Edmund's Choral Society chose Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" for its concert on the 1st ult., conducted by Mr. Owen A. Clark, when a decided musical success was achieved, but the attendance was somewhat limited. Miss Amy Harding, Miss Katherine Comber, Mr. E. Dalzell, Mr. M. Dene, and Mr. Schofield sang the principal vocal parts effectively, and the chorus left but little to be desired.

The Mildenhall and District Musical Society gave a miscellaneous sacred concert, on the 6th ult., before a large audience. The band and chorus numbered about fifty. By assiduous practice, under the direction of Mr. J. T. Antill, the Society was enabled to make a highly creditable appearance, Rossini's "To Thee, great Lord," and the chorale from the "Hymn of Praise" being sung with finish and precision. The band was equally successful in a selection from the symphony to the latter work, and other compositions. The solos were entrusted to Madame Serruys, Miss K. Comber, Mr. W. J. Owers, and Mr. Owen A. Clark, whose efforts were much appreciated.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(From our own Correspondent.)

If ever butterflies were broken on the wheel it was when some of Schubert's "Deutsche Tänze"—delicate, tender creations as the composer, "le plus poëte que jamais," ever penned—were set for full chorus and orchestra, their keys arbitrarily changed, the notes even altered in value, connected by passages which sink far below mediocrity, and wedded to words which are a perfect triumph of inanity. The outrage—it is nothing less—was emphasized at Mr. Kirkhope's Choir concert, on the 7th ult., by a choice of tempi which suggested that the conductor did not know the originals of the caricatures he presented. It is a great pity that such an unpleasant impression should tarnish the recollection of the most perfect exhibition of choral singing heard in Edinburgh for many a long year. Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride" has been given more than once by Mr. Kirkhope's choir as well as by older societies, but the delicacy of nuance, the certainty of attack, the general appreciation of the choral possibilities shown by the splendid body of singers on this occasion were little short of absolute perfection. The soloists were Miss Esther Palliser, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Andrew Black.

An important choral event was the performance of Bach's "St. Matthew' Passion, in St. Mary's Cathedral, on the 9th ult. Those who love this noble music and appreciate its difficulties would be the last to direct attention to obvious imperfections in its interpretation on this occasion. There was quite enough to satisfy the critical ear as well as the understanding heart, and to encourage a hope that next Lent will see an improved rendering before as large and as reverential a congregation. Mr. Gledhill sang the recitative music with rare feeling and care, and the music committed to Mr. Purves was also enjoyably rendered. Great praise is due to Mr. Collinson, whose unwearied efforts resulted in such a measure of success. The small, but well-balanced orchestra was supplemented by the organ.

At St. Paul's, York Place, the choir gave Gounod's "Redemption" on the 3rd ult. Mr. Prendergast, choirmaster of the church, supplied the organ accompaniment.

On the 6th ult. Mr. Millar Craig's choir presented Cherubini's beautiful Requiem Mass. The second part consisted of Liza Lehmann's charming cycle, "In a Persian Garden," produced for the first time here. The solo music was sympathetically interpreted by Miss Kate Forbes Gray, Mrs. Anderson, Mr. C. C. Scott, and Mr. J. H. Kennedy.

At the University examinations for the degree of Mus. Bac., held at the end of March, the following candidates satisfied the examiners: First Professional, Miss Agnes Johnston, Miss Margaret Fullarton Kennedy, and Mr. Matthew Shirlaw; Literary part of the second Professional, Miss Agnes Johnston and Miss Christina Struthers. The examiners were Professor Niecks, Sir A. C. Mackenzie, and Mr. Franklin Peterson.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

On the 5th ult. the Glasgow Society of Musicians held a special meeting to consider the question as to whether Glasgow should have a city organist. After a lengthy discussion a large majority voted in favour of Mr. Summers's motion to the effect that no city organist should be appointed. The last concert for the season of the Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society was chiefly remarkable for the appearance of Mr. Henri Verbrugghen, one of Ysaye's most gifted pupils, who created a great impression in Max Bruch's D minor Violin Concerto. Mr. J. More Smieton's cantata "King Arthur" was given by the Airdrie Choral Union on the evening of March 31, when the popular work appealed to many new friends. The performance was in every way a success. On the 11th ult. Stainer's "Crucifixion" was sung at Govan by the Parish Church Choir, which was augmented for the occasion.

Glasgow Cathedral was completely filled on the evening of the 15th ult., when Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion Music was given under the auspices of the Glasgow Choral Union. Bearing in mind the miserable support accorded to the same work when it was produced in St. Andrew's Hall last November, it spoke volumes for the enterprise shown by our premier choral society to risk another performance so soon. Many conditions favoured, however, the success of the venture, not the least being the highly appropriate locale chosen for the occasion. The performance all round was remarkably fine, the chorus (comprising fifty boys' voices) did their conductor, Mr. Joseph Bradley, every credit; and Mr. W. H. Cole led a large orchestra, which included seventeen first violins, eight of whom were ladies. The solos were in the competent charge of Misses Taggart and Wilson, Mr. H. T. Brearley and Mr. Daniel Price.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

What may be regarded as the closing month of the regular provincial season has been full of interest. First and foremost in the record of events must be placed the production in England of Berlioz's "Les Troyens," by the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, on March 30. The work was composed by Berlioz in his later and overburdened years. It was produced in Paris in 1863, and then remained on the shelf till it was included in the Berlioz cycle at Karlsruhe in 1889. Although the opera naturally loses by being produced on the concert platform, it made a very deep impression, and it is to be hoped that before long London amateurs will enjoy an opportunity of hearing this characteristic work of the French composer's genius. The performance, in which Madame Duma, Mrs. Fisk, Miss Izard, Mr. Hirwen Jones, Mr. Douglas Powell, and Mr. Edward Lloyd took part, was more than adequate. The elaborate orchestral accompaniments were well played, considering that only two rehearsals were possible. Mr. F. H. Cowen conducted with his usual efficiency. The end of the short Royal Carl Rosa Opera season was made memorable by the first local attempt at the production of so vast a work as Wagner's "Walkyrie," at the Royal Court Theatre. On the 3rd ult. the repeatedly and deservedly commended People's Orchestra gave a ladies' concert, at which Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in A (the solo being admirably played by Mr. Leonard Borwick) divided the appreciation of the audience with Tschaïkowsky's strongly contrasted "Pathetic" Symphony, of which a noble performance was achieved under Mr. A. E. Rodewald.

On the 6th ult. the Società Armonica, of which the rejuvenation under Mr. V. V. Akeroyd has before been chronicled, gave Mozart's G minor Symphony and an excellent selection of other music at the small Concert-room, St. George's Hall. The best Concert yet given by the College of Music Orchestra, now complete in every department, took place on the 8th ult., Mr. Courvoisier conducting as usual. The programme comprised Mozart's D major Symphony (No. 9) and Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, in which the first and second sections of the solo part were respectively played by two clever students, Miss H. Grant and Miss A. Crouch.

A chamber performance of the Schiever Quartet followed on the 10th ult. On the same evening, at a "smoking" concert of chamber music at the City Hall, two excerpts from Schubert's Octet, Beethoven's Septet, and a Mozart Quartet comprised in the scheme. In the course of the evening Mr. A. E. Rodewald, from whose orchestra the performers were recruited, was made the recipient of a deserved testimonial. At both these concerts Mr. F. W. Austin won high favour by his very excellent singing.

At the Pro-Cathedral Gounod's "Redemption" was repeated on the 1st ult., under Mr. C. Collins, Mr. F. H. Burstall being at the organ; and on the 9th ult. a Jubilee celebration of the founding of the Mount Pleasant Presbyterian Choral Society took place, under Mr. W. Lee.

Intimation has come to hand of performances of Gaul's "Joan of Arc," at Liscard, under Mr. Swift; of Spohr's "Last Judgment," at Warrington, under Mr. Crossley; and at Huyton and Garston of Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron," under Mr. T. Ashworth and Mr. Coller respectively. The same cantata was also announced by the Aughton Choral Society, for the 29th ult., by Mr. Courvoisier.

Mr. Hugh Percy Allen, of Christ College, Cambridge, has been appointed organist and choirmaster of St. Asaph Cathedral. There were over 200 applicants.

Dr. Peace's recitals have been intermittent, owing to the sittings of the Law Courts at St. George's Hall; they have shown no sign of decadence, but rather the reverse, in the estimation of the public.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

Very appropriately, the music of our regular season finished with the concluding concert of Mr. Brodsky's quartet party. The hold upon the public which the recitals of chamber music that Mr. Brodsky has so well established justifies the confident assurance that when, in October next, they are resumed, the Gentlemen's Concert Hall will be far too small. But as, in the splendid hotel which the Midland Railway Company is about to build, a large and handsome hall is to be placed, probably the temporary want of a suitable home may lead to accommodation of a sumptuous nature. The programme of the fifth concert was extremely interesting, including as it did the Schumann Quartet in F (Op. 41) and the Schubert Quintet in C (Op. 163). The Mozart Quintet in A for strings and clarinet sounded rather old-fashioned after the more advanced works; and, charmingly as the wind instrument was played by Mr. F. Norton, there was a lack of that perfect blending of tone which has been so delightful in all the performances of the string party.

The last of the Harrison concerts was somewhat disappointing. Lady Hallé's re-appearance in the Free Trade Hall had been looked for with such general interest that through the very crowded audience a distinct thrill of pain passed when the announcement was made of her indisposition; and the zealous exertions of a strong company of singers and players could not altogether atone for the absence of one who must always retain a peculiarly warm place in our esteem. It is earnestly hoped that next season Lady Hallé may be able to come among us as freely as of yore.

The first concert by the Manchester Male-Voice Chorus was given at the Gentlemen's Concert Hall, on the 8th ult., when the feature in the programme was Max Bruch's "Frithjof." The solo vocalists were Miss Stuart Cummins and Mr. Charles Clark, who displayed a fine baritone voice and artistic method. Mr. L. Risegari (violin) and Mr. Ed. Sachs (pianoforte) played Raff's Suite (Op. 210) and the Adagio from the Sonata (Op. 108) by Brahms, "In Memoriam" of that composer.

The Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company is having a short and, I fear, not very successful season here.

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

On the 8th ult. the Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union gave a remarkably fine performance of Brahms's "German" Requiem. Little was it thought, when the work was placed in rehearsal, that before the date of its performance its composer would have passed over to the great majority. The death of Johannes Brahms invested the occasion with additional interest, and, as a mark of respect to the master, the audience was requested to listen to the work in silence. The performance of the "German" Requiem is, as those who know Brahms's music will readily admit, no slight undertaking for a provincial society. All the more credit, therefore, is due to the Choral Union for the excellent account it gave of the work. The choir of nearly 400 voices sang the choruses admirably; no finer chorus singing has been heard in this locality for many years. The orchestra, too, was excellent, considering that only one full rehearsal was practicable. The principal vocalists were Miss Marie Fillünger and Mr. Douglas Powell. Mr. T. Wilkinson presided at the organ with ability, and Mr. J. M. Preston conducted with remarkable skill and discretion. The second part of the concert was miscellaneous.

On the 7th ult. the South Shields Choral Society gave its final concert of the season, the principal work selected for the occasion being Sullivan's "Golden Legend," which, notwithstanding its popularity elsewhere, had not previously been heard in South Shields. The performance was, on the whole, very praiseworthy, and reflected much credit upon the Society and its conductor. The soloists were Miss Ada Patterson, Miss Jessie King, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, Mr. John Sandbrook, and Mr. W. Tone Allen. The choir, numbering some 150 voices, sang the choruses in a praiseworthy manner, and the orchestra of fifty performers was thoroughly capable. Mr. M. Fairs conducted with much ability, and Miss Annie Smith presided at the organ.

The Heaton Amateur Vocal Union gave a performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" in the Presbyterian Church, Heaton Road, Newcastle, on the 2nd ult., under the conductorship of Mr. John Murray.

Several performances of Stainer's "Crucifixion" have recently taken place in the churches in this locality, notably at St. Luke's Church, Wallsend, under the direction of Mr. E. J. Gibbon; and at Holy Trinity Church, Gateshead, under Mr. N. Coulson.

Rossini's "Stabat Mater" was successfully performed at St. Thomas's Church, Sunderland, on Good Friday, under the direction of Mr. George F. Vincent, the organist of the church, who presided at the organ. The choir was assisted by Miss A. Stevenson and Miss Millar, who rendered material assistance in the solos.

Mr. C. Lee Williams's cantata "The Last Night at Bethany" was given on the 14th ult., at the Parish Church, Ryton, under the direction of Mr. Nichol, organist of the church.

On the 9th ult. the Dunelm Musical Society gave Handel's "Judas Maccabæus." The soloists were Miss Stevenson, Madame Marie Bellas, Mr. D. S. Macdonald, and Mr. W. Peacock. There was a small orchestra, and Mr. F. Eustace Leatham conducted.

On March 25 the Wooler Choral Society, of which Mr. C. Stanley Wise is the conductor, gave a performance of "The Messiah" in the Tower Hill Presbyterian Church. The soloists were Miss M. Jacques, Miss M. Beers, Mr. E. Kemp, and Mr. D. Harrison.

The Durham Amateur Orchestral Society gave its first concert on March 29, under the able direction of Mr. Arthur Wallerstein, with marked success. The programme included Beethoven's "Prometheus" and Schubert's "Rosamunde" overtures, in addition to Mozart's Symphony in C. Miss Hilda Richardson was heartily applauded for her violoncello solos, and Mr. John Nutton sang two songs with much acceptance.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

There is almost nothing out of the ordinary to record in the musical doings of the Lent term. The usual fixtures have all taken place in the usual course. Public classical concerts and Balliol concerts have pursued the even tenor of their way, the only variations being that Mr. Farmer had a special Bach programme at Balliol and that Dr. Joachim played in an orchestral programme this year. We also had a visit from the ladies known as the "Shinner" Quartet, who succeeded in attracting a fairly numerous and appreciative audience.

Sir John Stainer's terminal lecture was, as usual, full of original research, and amongst the illustrations was a motet by Sweelinck based on the "Old Hundredth," which is hardly likely to be allowed to slip back into the dusty shelves where it has reposed so long. Messrs. Garwood and Hadow have also given public lectures for the Professor.

The solitary deviation from routine that has taken place since the beginning of the year has been the production of some new music for the "Knights" of Aristophanes, written for the performance of that play by the University Dramatic Society by Mr. Bussell, of Brasenose. Large use was made of popular tunes by the composer, and though the reasons for their being employed were not always obvious, considerable skill was shown in the treatment of them. The music appeared to be rather beyond the powers of the singers who had to attempt to perform it, and Dr. Roberts, who conducted with unflagging energy, must have had some unenviable moments.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

On the 14th ult. the Sheffield Choral Union performed Costa's "Eli," under Mr. S. Suckley. The principals were selected from the ranks of the Society. Mr. W. Mason led the band, and Mr. H. Clough was organist. The choral portions of the work were admirably sung.

On Good Friday several musical performances took place. Dr. Coward's "Story of Bethany" was given by the Attercliffe Zion Choral Society, under Mr. W. W. Chisholm. The Sharrow Philharmonic Society, a newly formed organisation, performed "The Messiah" in creditable style, under Mr. J. C. W. Corbett. Stainer's "The Crucifixion" was sung in several of the city churches and at Eyam.

The Belper Musical Society gave "Elijah," in the Public Hall, on March 31, under the direction of Mr. T. B. Mellor. The principals were Miss Ada Lee, Miss Madge Robottom, Mr. Lacey Parker, and Mr. Stanley Cookson.

The St. John's Abbeydale Choral Society gave a successful concert, on the 9th ult., under Mr. G. A. Seed, when Cowen's "The Rose Maiden" was capitally rendered.

The Wirksworth Choral Society performed "Elijah," on the 8th ult., in the Parish Church. Mr. M. M. Day conducted, and Mr. Neville Cox was organist.

MUSIC IN THE SOUTHERN COUNTIES.

The annual concert of the Marlborough Choral Society took place on March 30, when Handel's "Messiah" was performed. The chorus numbered over sixty voices, and the accompaniments were played on the pianoforte and organ respectively by Miss Annie Greenland and Mr. George Whitehead. Miss Elsie Butterfield, Miss Beatrice Chambers, Mr. James Horncastle, and Mr. Rowland Hughes were the solo vocalists, and Mr. W. S. Bambridge conducted as usual. At St. Peter's Church, on the 2nd ult., Stainer's "Crucifixion" was sung, under the direction of Mr. E. Salisbury, the solos being taken by Mr. Prior and Mr. Shillito. Miss Salisbury most ably presided at the organ.

The Salisbury Philharmonic Society—conductor, Mr. Alfred Foley—announced a concert to take place at the County Hall, on the 26th ult. The programme was to include Stanford's choral ballad "Phaudrig Crohoore" and "The Queen's Song," by Eaton Faning.

A performance of Gounod's "Redemption" was given by the Choral and Orchestral Union of the G.W.R. Institute, New Swindon, on March 30, and listened to with great interest by a large audience. The principal vocalists were Madame Emily Squire, Mr. C. Emlyn Jones, Mr. R. Grice, and Mr. W. Llewellyn. Mr. H. T. Sims conducted with admirable skill.

There should have been a larger attendance at the last Concert of the season given by the Trowbridge Musical Union on the 6th ult., when Costa's "Eli" was performed. The members of the chorus, generally speaking, did their work well, and a word of praise is due to the orchestra. Miss Alice Crawley, Master Percy Woodward, Mr. Samuel Masters, Mr. Charles Tinney, and Mr. Walter Snailum were the principals; and Mr. H. Millington conducted.

Sir John Stainer's meditation "The Crucifixion" was given in the Parish Church, Melksham, on the 14th ult., under the direction of the organist, Mr. C. H. Ogle, with Mr. J. B. Wickham and Mr. H. Finch as soloists.

Mr. Charles Fletcher gave his annual concert on the 2nd ult., at the Shaftesbury Hall, Bournemouth, assisted by his string orchestra numbering about 100 performers. The programme included Spohr's Ninth Concerto (with Mr. Fletcher himself as the soloist), Beethoven's String Quartet in B flat, and Mendelssohn's Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello in D (Op. 58), beautifully played by Miss Polyxena Fletcher and Miss Maud Fletcher. The vocalists were Miss Grosvenor Gooch, Miss Mounsey Heysham, Mr. Gerald Lee, Mr. Algernon J. F. Nugent, and Mr. Howard May. Madame Fletcher and Miss Jennie Cooke presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Charles Fletcher conducted.

At the Parish Church, Andover, Stainer's "Crucifixion" was given, under the conductorship of Mr. J. W. Chuter, on the 5th ult., by an augmented choir. The solos were given with appropriate expression by Mr. R. E. Burlingham and Mr. W. D. Braithwaite, and Mr. H. W. Chuter accompanied on the organ.

The same popular work was also sung at the Above Bar Congregational Church, Southampton, on the 8th ult., Mr. E. F. Barrow and Mr. F. Julian being the soloists, and Mr. Percy Withers the organist. The same work was given in St. Mary's Church, on Good Friday; while at St. Lawrence, the music performed was the Passion Music from "The Messiah" and selections from Rossini's "Stabat Mater."

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

The visit of Dr. Joachim to Leeds has for many years past been an annual event at the subscription concerts, and this year an unusually successful season was brought to a close, on the 7th ult., by a chamber concert in which the great violinist took a prominent part, and, much to the credit of Leeds, attracted a large audience. Not for years has he played more finely; and the concert came to an impressive conclusion with a remarkably fine performance of Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in A (Op. 26), the other players being Miss Fanny Davies, Mr. Alfred Gibson, and Mr. Whitehouse. Mr. Rawdon Briggs also appeared as second violin in a Beethoven quartet, and Miss Rosa Green was the vocalist. The amalgamation of the subscription concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society has proved a great success. It has resulted not only in economy of administration, but in interesting a larger section of the public, and a surplus of something like £200 is expected from the season's working. "Nothing succeeds like success," so next year we may confidently look for at least as much support, with proportionately better fare. In another respect a distinct advance has been made here, for the orchestral fever seems to have reached even Leeds, by no means an advanced town in musical matters, in spite of—or it may be because of—its triennial festivals. There are now three separate orchestral societies doing good work at Leeds. The Leeds Permanent Orchestra's doings we have already had occasion to chronicle, and now there are those of the older established Symphony Society and the Leeds Orchestra to be recorded. The former, a society chiefly amateur in its composition, showed a very marked improvement in the concert given on the 6th ult., under Mr. Grimshaw's sympathetic direction. Gade's Fourth Symphony in B flat and Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" overture, with Wagner's Concert-coda, were the chief things, and were more than creditably performed. A selection from the first set of Brahms's "Liebeslieder" was also an attractive feature in the programme. The Leeds Orchestra's concert was given on the 11th ult., when three movements from Mendelssohn's Second Symphony and the "Egmont" overture were played with vigour and "go," the strings comparing well in the matter of tone with those of the Symphony Society. What they most want is delicacy and restraint. The band was heard to particular advantage in Massenet's "Scènes Pittoresques," and Mr. Elliott, who conducted, proved himself to be an accomplished violinist in a suite by Ries. A capital performance of Mendelssohn's G minor Pianoforte Concerto by Miss Stibbs was among the most enjoyable things of the evening. One of the most interesting concerts of the month has been one given by Miss Brigstocke and Mr. Heller on March 27, at which Arensky's Pianoforte Trio in D minor was introduced to Leeds. It was played with brilliancy and sympathy by Miss Brigstocke (pianoforte), Mr. Gutfeld (violin), and Mr. H. Walenn (violoncello), all of whom afterwards contributed solos, while Mr. Heller sang some unhackneyed songs. The Leeds Parish Church choir has always been deservedly famous, and, though its excellence has raised a host of imitators, it still preserves an exceptional degree of efficiency. This has been demonstrated at two special Lenten services, at the former of which, on the 5th ult., Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion Music was given, while at the latter, on the 12th ult., Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" was heard for the first time at the Parish Church. In this case the Leeds Permanent Orchestra lent very valuable assistance, and only the untimely collapse of the electric light, just as the grandiose "Amen" was well under weigh, prevented a thoroughly satisfactory result. Mr. Benton prepared and directed both performances, in the one case playing the organ and in the other conducting.

Considering that every performer was from the immediate neighbourhood, the all-round excellence of the renderings was the more creditable. The Messrs. Haddock have not been idle. At the last of their historical recitals, on March 24, pianoforte and violin sonatas by Brahms, Dvorák, and Grieg were ably played by Messrs. Ayres and Edgar Haddock; and on the 8th ult. Mr. Chilver-Wilson, one of the teachers at the Messrs. Haddock's College at Leeds, gave an interesting vocal recital with the aid of some of his pupils.

At Bradford, the Festival Choral Society ended its season on the 2nd ult. with Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," the soloists being Madame Amy Sherwin, Mrs. Ashcroft Clarke, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Douglas Powell. The interest of the occasion centred in the fact that this was the first appearance of Mr. Cowen as conductor of the society. Inspired by him both the chorus and the Bradford Permanent Orchestra united in giving a performance which, taken altogether, was very far above their average efforts for some time past. Under a musician with Mr. Cowen's ability and prestige the society seems likely to achieve even greater distinction than it has won in the past.

Only one Huddersfield concert of importance falls to be recorded—the last of the subscription series—and that was of no great artistic moment; for the band of the Coldstream Guards, excellent in its way, is hardly in its most fitting place in a concert-room. At Halifax, the Northgate End Orchestral Society gave a concert on March 25. Under Mr. J. Priestley, several of Schubert's works, varied by the music of Gounod, Vincent Wallace, Prout, and Mendelssohn, were given with generally satisfactory results. Another promising local orchestra, the Dewsbury Orchestral Band, gave, on March 27, a concert with a "popular" programme intended to attract the people, and so benefit the Indian Famine Fund. Mr. G. H. Hirst, the conductor, directed very praiseworthy performances of Nicolai's "Merry Wives" overture and German's "Henry VIII." Dances. Miss Bishop and Mr. Kemp sang pleasingly, and Messrs. J. Brown and Wood were the instrumental soloists. On March 29 the Pudsey Choral Union, of which Mr. Albert Jowett is conductor, gave a highly creditable performance of "St. Paul," with Mesdames Robertshaw and Grew, Messrs. Taylor and Billington as soloists. Another stock oratorio, "Judas Maccabæus," was chosen by the Oakworth Choral Society for its concert on March 23, under Mr. Moore's direction. The Harrogate subscription concerts, promoted by Messrs. Naylor and Gutfeld, came to an end on March 25, when an exceptionally interesting programme was given. Smetana's Pianoforte Trio in G minor (Op. 15) and Schubert's "Trout" Quintet were the main attractions, and solos were given by Mr. G. Walenn (violin), Mr. H. Walenn (violoncello), and Mrs. Creser, whose songs included some interesting compositions by Mr. C. L. Naylor. It is satisfactory to learn that these excellent concerts have proved a financial as well as an artistic success.

The York Musical Society's performance of Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," on March 30, seemed to indicate that the society has, under Canon Hudson's energetic and very painstaking conductorship, taken a new lease of life. The accuracy of the chorus-singing was most praiseworthy, and the band did well, though the strings were not quite satisfactory in either tone or precision. The soloists were Madame Clara Samuell, Mrs. Burrell, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. Arthur Walenn, of whom the last-named was particularly successful in realising the meaning of what he sang. The Hull Vocal Society, of whose chorus good things are spoken, gave a Mendelssohn programme on the 6th ult. "Athalie" and the "Hymn of Praise" were the works chosen, and of such exceedingly familiar music it is needless to say that a good account was given under Dr. Smith's direction. The principals were Madame Bertha Moore, Miss Mayes, Miss Langford, and Mr. Brearley, with Miss Lilian Hovey as reciter. The Whitby Choral Society, of which Mr. Hallgate has for many years past been the conductor, is congratulating itself on the fact that, with a largely increased expenditure, it is the better off for the season's work to the extent of three shillings! The programmes have not been very ambitious, for neither the "Hymn of Praise," Cowen's "Rose Maiden," nor yet selections from the works of Gilbert and Sullivan can be said to be particularly exacting for a well-trained chorus. But what has been done has been done as satisfactorily as the society's means would permit. The Middlesbrough Musical Union, like the Leeds subscription concerts, adopts the excellent custom of engaging Dr. Joachim for one of its Concerts, and accordingly the season ended on March 31 with a Chamber Concert in which the great Hungarian violinist was the principal attraction.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

A gala performance of Verdi's "Otello" was given on the 13th ult., at the Opéra, in aid of the "Ligne fraternelle des enfants de France," on which occasion Signor Tamagno made his first appearance here in the titular part, and was enthusiastically applauded by the audience, who were very greatly struck by his powerful voice. The other leading interpreters were Madame Caron and MM. Delmas, Vaguet, and Gresse. Mdlle. Ganne has obtained leave of absence from the Opéra, the lady having undertaken the part of Brünnhilde in the forthcoming first production of "Die Walküre" in Marseilles.

At the Opéra Comique Mdlle. Van Zandt made her re-appearance on March 30, when she sang the part of Zerlina in "Don Giovanni" for the first time in Paris. On the 27th of the same month a very satisfactory revival took place of Godard's "La Vivandière," with Mdlles. Delna and Laisné, and MM. Fugère, Badiali, and Leprestre in the principal parts. A new one-act opera, "Daphnis et Chloé," the libretto by M. Charles Rafaéli, the music by M. Henri Büsser, has been accepted for performance by M. Carvalho. On the 10th ult. Boieldieu's "La Dame Blanche" was revived, the evergreen work being given in accordance with the original score, and without the numerous modifications which both conductors and vocalists had little by little introduced in the performance.

The winding up of the season of the Lamoureux concerts had been interrupted by the London engagement of the orchestra. However, in the concert of the 4th ult. we were once more treated to an excellent performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with Mesdames Leroux-Ribeyre and Passama, Mdlle. Engel and Ghasne in the solo quartet. On the same occasion M. Sechiari, a young violinist of the orchestra, made his début as a solo performer on his instrument, and proved himself, in the second Concerto by Wieniawski, a virtuoso of the first order.

In the Colonne concert of the 4th ult. the celebrated Belgian violinist, M. Ysaye, took part, and gave an admirable rendering of a poème for violin by M. Chausson, produced for the first time; a work replete with character and novelty of form, but somewhat sober in its colouring, and therefore of insufficient interest to the general public. The programme also included a portion of Liszt's "Faust" symphony, which was greatly appreciated. The concert of the 11th ult. resulted in a series of ovations to MM. Ysaye and Pugno, the violinist and pianist respectively of the occasion, the former playing the Beethoven concerto and a sonata by Bach, the latter Schumann's concerto and some "pièces romantiques" of his own composition.

The concerts given by virtuosos continue to be numerous. Those of Mr. Harold Bauer always attract crowded audiences, that eminent artist devoting himself almost exclusively to works of the highest order, which, moreover, he interprets in an entirely worthy manner and with a simply superb technique. He announces a fresh series of three performances on the 24th ult. and the 4th and 13th inst., with the co-operation of MM. Marsick and Salmon.

At one of the recent chamber concerts of M. Philipp, a notable novelty was a set of pieces for oboe, entitled "Scènes villageoises," from the pen of M. de Boisdeffre.

M. Horace Britt, a highly-gifted young violoncellist, scored a distinct success in a concert given, with the co-operation of the Lamoureux Orchestra, on March 19, when he introduced, amongst other numbers, a "Concertstück" by M. G. Callaert, an Antwerp composer and organist.

Mdlle. Weingaertner, a pianist of considerable attainments, gave a recital here last month, when she met with great appreciation. In addition to several numbers by classical masters, the lady played the entire series of the "Valses sérieuses" by M. René Lenormand, the interpretation of which latter formed, indeed, one of her principal successes on the occasion. Her father, M. Weingaertner, an excellent violinist, is the leader of a string quartet party, the performances of which are invariably well attended. On the last occasion the programme included part of a quartet written by an eleven-year-old child of the name of Bourdon. Precociousness in musical composition is, it must be admitted, more rare and more noteworthy than precocity in executive development, and the case in question thus deserves to be recorded.

Another pianist, M. Falcke, has gained numerous admirers during the past season, combining as he does technical perfection with a sympathetic individuality, and a charm of interpretation which appertains to him personally.

Mr. Arthur Reginald Little, a New York pianist, gave a successful recital, on the 3rd ult., and amongst other virtuosos of the instrument recently giving concerts may be named MM. Risler, Delafosse, Nadaud, Chevillard, and Mdlle. Toutin.

The Académie des Beaux Arts has awarded the Kastner-Boursault prize to M. J. Combarieu, for his two interesting volumes: "Les rapports de la musique et de la poésie" and "Théorie du rythme dans la composition musicale."

MUSIC IN MONTREAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Philharmonic Society completed its twentieth season with its ninth annual festival, which took place on the 7th, 8th, and 9th ult. The programme was the most ambitious hitherto undertaken, as it included Beethoven's Ninth (Choral) Symphony. The other works were Max Bruch's "Arminius" and Wagner's "Tannhäuser," both of which had been previously given by the society, and Massenet's "Mary Magdalen." The matinée concert included Tschaïkowsky's Overture "1812," Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre," Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, Dubois's "Trois petites pièces," Liszt's "Les Préludes," and Wieniawski's Concerto, No. 2 (first movement), for violin, played with great effect by Mr. C. Moerenhout. The fine rendering which the Choral Symphony received was ample evidence of diligent study on the part of the members, and the work was ably conducted by Mr. Mollenhauer, the Associate conductor. The opening concert was devoted to "Arminius." On the second evening, Massenet's sacred drama was finely performed and received the unstinted applause of a large audience. "Tannhäuser," repeated from last season, again proved to be the greatest attraction. The performance was a very good one and formed a fitting close to a fine series of concerts. Mr. Guillaume Couture once more demonstrated his great ability as the society's conductor.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

Just now speculation is rife as to what will be the developments of the next season in regard to grand opera in New York. Neither the regular season at the Metropolitan Opera House nor the extra season of German opera, given under the direction of Mr. Damrosch, came anywhere near being a financial success. Moreover, neither of the companies succeeded in making good their losses on their tours. It is positively stated that the brothers De Reszke have declined to return to America for another season, which will deprive the Metropolitan of two of its strongest attractions. It is also reported that Mr. Damrosch has engaged Madame Melba for his company, and that he will probably also retain the services of Madame Nordica, from which it would seem as though he intended leaving the field of German compositions to which he has hitherto confined himself so closely, and would compete with the forces of Mr. Grau on their own ground. Mr. Damrosch has made no bid for a lease of the Metropolitan for next season, and it now seems as though there might be a battle royal between impresarios next season, or else that the Metropolitan people might withdraw and leave their rivals in possession. At the moment of writing the stockholders of the Metropolitan have been in session considering plans for their building, but no definite results have been reached.

Among the last efforts of the Damrosch Opera Company was the production of a grand opera in four acts, by Mr. Xaver Scharwenka, who has been at the head of a conservatory of music in New York for some years. The scene of the opera is laid during the sixth century and it deals with Gothic history. It portrays the conventional conflict between love and duty, and contains a good many effective situations of a rather lurid and gloomy order. The opera was produced for the first time in Germany last fall, and is said to have made a powerful impression there. At its appearance here Mr. Scharwenka conducted the orchestra himself, and displayed a thorough command over his forces. But notwithstanding this, and the fact that new scenery and costumes had been provided and considerable care spent in preparation, "Mataswintha" did not rouse any special enthusiasm. It is doubtful if it will be performed again.

On March 10 and 11 the Cecilia Society, of Boston, sang Beethoven's great "Missa Solemnis" in the Music Hall in that city. The solo quartet was made up of Miss Wright, Miss Little, Mr. Frederick Smith, and Mr. Arthur Beresford. Accounts from Boston commend the society and its conductor for their courage and conscientiousness in undertaking this enormous work, but do not speak of it as having been more than measurably successful. It has only been given two or three times in this country, and never with any great degree of éclat, and the Boston critics think that it is not worth while to undertake what can never be satisfactorily performed.

On March 18 the Musical Art Society of New York gave its second and last Concert of the season in Carnegie Hall, presenting the following programme: "Miserere," Allegri; "Crucifixus," Lotti; "Ave Verum," Josquin de Prés; "Timor et Tremor," Orlando di Lasso; "O Filii et Filiæ," Volckmar Leisring; "God's time is the best," J. S. Bach; "Nachtwache," 1 and 2 (Brahms); two selections for viole d'amour—Andante and Minuet, Milandre; "Plaisir d'Amour," Martini; "Liebe, dir Ergeb' ich Mich," Cornelius.

This society has devoted so much study to the works of the old masters that it produces them with a very high degree of perfection. In fact, for pure art, such as makes its appeal to a cultivated appreciation of music, these concerts are by far the best now given in the country. The viole de gamba used were from the collection of Mr. Steiner, of New Haven, who has collected a large number of curious and obsolete instruments.

In the same week the Oratorio Club of Brooklyn gave a concert in Plymouth Church, bringing forward Schubert's "Miriam's Song" and a short and very attractive cantata called "The Rose," by Mr. W. W. Gilchrist, of Philadelphia. The latter work was given some two years ago by the same society. Mr. Walter Henry Hall is the conductor of the Club.

A choral society has been formed among the members of the Russian colony in New York, which made its first venture on the 2nd ult. The conductor, Mr. Platon Brunoff, has gathered most of his chorus material from such amateurs as he could find, and naturally his choice has been considerably limited. Notwithstanding this the society accomplished some creditable singing of Russian folk-songs, and the soloists played only Russian compositions, so that the Concert had an individual and novel flavour which was interesting.

In Pittsburg, at the great Carnegie Library and Music Hall building, Mr. Frederic Archer has all the winter continued his weekly organ recitals, and has supplemented them by a series of lectures on the great composers, illustrated by pianoforte and organ arrangements from their works. These recitals and lectures have had an astonishing educational influence, especially among the working people of Pittsburg, who flock to them by thousands. All sorts and conditions of men are admitted—children also, and the small people are furnished with programmes like their elders, and allowed to enjoy the music to their hearts' content. It is said that children can be seen among the audiences who are regular habitués of these concerts. The recitals are given on Sunday afternoons, and generally draw audiences of about 3,000 persons each. The secondary effect of these entertainments is to be seen in the increased interest and improved quality of work manifested by the choirs and choral societies of Pittsburg and its vicinity.

On March 27, the choir and orchestra of the Bow and Bromley Institute gave a concert in the Institute Hall, under the direction of Dr. W. G. McNaught. The programme included "Phaudrig Crohoore" (Stanford), "The Song of Miriam" (Schubert), in which the solo was ably sung by Miss Amy Sargent, and Handel's Organ Concerto in B flat, in which the solo part was played by Mr. H. F. Ellingford. On Good Friday the choir gave the usual performance of "The Messiah." The principals were Madame Kate Cove, Miss Eliza Thomas, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Sutton Shepley (in place of Mr. W. H. Brereton, who was indisposed). Mr. W. Frye Parker led the orchestra, Mr. Ellingford presided at the organ, and Dr. McNaught conducted. The Bow and Bromley Institute Choir and Orchestra of 150 performers gave an excellent concert at the People's Palace on the 10th ult., to a large and appreciative audience. The selections included Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture, Stanford's amusing Irish ballad "Phaudrig Crohoore," and Somervell's dramatic "Charge of the Light Brigade," in the Finale of which the melodies of "God save the Queen" and "St. Ann's" tune are very effectively combined. Dr. W. G. McNaught conducted with all the skill incidental to good musicianship combined with long experience in wielding the baton.

St. George's Hall, the time-honoured abode of the German Reed combination, was re-opened (with new decorations, electric lighting, &c.) as the Matinée Theatre on the 17th ult. The manager, Mr. Philip Yorke, has made a laudable effort to supply a high-class "variety" entertainment for afternoon audiences, though hardly as yet with success. The chief musical feature was a new pantomime play "La revanche des Cigales," with music by Leon Schlesinger. Of the latter it is hardly possible yet to speak definitely, for the orchestra provided was by no means satisfactory and the work appeared to be insufficiently rehearsed. The music, which was conducted by the composer, has, however, a good deal of charm. There was also a new operetta "A Royal Roundhead," the music composed by Denham Harrison; but we cannot speak favourably either of the music or its performance. The Court Singers deserve mention for their excellent part-singing; but the chief success of the afternoon was undoubtedly the exquisitely sympathetic recitation of Tennyson's "May Queen," by Mrs. Bernard Beere, who was very heartily received on her rentrée after her long illness.

A Sunday School choir competition (under the auspices of the Sunday School Union) was held at the Surrey Chapel, Blackfriars, on the 1st ult. A number of local competitions had been previously held, and the prize winners of each section were invited to compete for a banner and other prizes, value £10, generously offered by Mr. Warmington. Seven choirs competed. The test pieces were the two-part arrangement of "All among the barley" (Stirling) and "O wert thou in the cauld blast" (Mendelssohn). In addition, each choir had to prepare three pieces of its own selection, one of which was chosen by the adjudicator for performance at the time of the competition. The first prize was taken by the Hanover School, Lambeth, the second by the Onslow School (S.W. district), and the third by Stormont Road (Clapham) School. All the choirs being prize choirs, deserve honourable mention. They were as follows: Pilgrim Fathers' School (South London), Presbyterian Church (Bermondsey), Kentish Town School, and Willoughby Road (Islington) School. Dr. McNaught adjudicated.

We are informed by the committee of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Verein that the annual meeting of the association will be held from the 27th inst. to June 1, at Mannheim. The proceedings will include six concert performances, three of orchestral and choral works, and three of chamber music, besides a matinée devoted exclusively to Brahms. Amongst the works to be produced are Berlioz's "Lelio," Liszt's "Dante" symphony, Strauss's "Zarathustra," a symphony by Vincent d'Indy, a string quartet by Klughardt, and a cantata by Prohaska. The solo performers include Signor Busoni, M. Petchnikoff, M. E. Risler, and others; MM. Vincent d'Indy, Strauss, and Weingartner will be amongst the conductors. The orchestra will be that of the Court Theatre, reinforced by members of those of Darmstadt and Mainz. A performance of M. Eugene d'Albert's opera "Gernot" will usher in the meeting on the 26th inst., and the proceedings will terminate with the production of Herr Weinberger's "Genesius," at the Court Theatre, the composer in each case conducting.

The Victoria Madrigal Society, established mainly for the performance of unaccompanied choral music, presented an attractive programme, on the 1st ult., at St. Martin's Town Hall, in aid of the Prince of Wales's Hospital Fund. Dr. J. Stanley Murray, the conductor, may be congratulated not only upon the excellent voices of the choir, but upon their even balance of tone. Gaul's "The Silent Land," Spofforth's "Hail, smiling morn," Pearsall's "Who shall win my lady fair," and Macfarren's "You stole my love" were among the best known pieces, and each was rendered with precision and delicacy. The choralists also made a good impression with a pleasing madrigal, not previously heard, "I lov'd a lass," by their conductor. The part-music was interspersed with vocal contributions from Miss Stanley Lucas, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. W. A. Peterkin, and by violin solos, played with breadth and freedom by Mdlle. Henrietta Murkens.

Miss A. V. Mukle and Miss Frances Thomas offered an unhackneyed programme at their chamber concert at Queen's (Small) Hall, on March 29. The first-named is an accomplished pianist, and her companion is an able clarinettist. Both took part in an interesting Trio in B flat (Op. 29), by Vincent d'Indy, in which they were associated with Miss May Mukle, a skilful violoncellist, and in Rheinberger's Nonet in E flat (Op. 130) for violin, viola, violoncello, double bass, flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, and horn, their partners in a good performance being Misses A. and F. Marshall, R. Watson, and Leila Bull, and Messrs. Chapman, Rice, and Brain. Miss Saidie Kaiser, a tasteful vocalist, was heard in a graceful song, "When my Gretchen sings," by Miss A. V. Mukle, and in morceaux by Dvorák and Brahms.

An excellent performance took place, on the 10th ult., at the Grocers' Company's School, Hackney Downs, of Gounod's Messe Solennelle, Schubert's "Song of Miriam," and the "Unfinished" symphony of the same master. In accomplishing their by no means easy task, the orchestra and choir of boys' and men's voices connected with the school acquitted themselves in an eminently praiseworthy manner; and the conductor, Mr. Ernest Newton, may be congratulated both upon the efficiency of the forces under his command and upon the zeal and ability on his part which have produced such excellent results. The solo parts were well rendered by Master H. Knott, Messrs. Henry Beaumont and Wilfred Cunliffe in the Mass, and Master A. S. Hillam in the cantata.

The Hampstead Conservatoire students made an exceedingly creditable display of proficiency at a concert in the large hall of the institution, on the 5th ult. The overture to "Don Giovanni" and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" were neatly played by the well-balanced orchestra, ably conducted by Mr. Cecil J. Sharp. Among the soloists distinguishing themselves were Miss Ada S. Blackwood, who gave, with considerable taste, the first movement of Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto; Mr. Otto Spamer, with a conscientious rendering of Bach's "Chaconne"; Miss L. R. Carey, Miss M. Traill, Mr. Bernard E. Farrer, Miss Ethel Spiller, and Miss F. Eadie. Mrs. Richter agreeably contributed a couple of vocal pieces. Mr. E. d'Evry accompanied, and, as a tribute to the memory of Brahms, played on the organ the Dead March in "Saul."

A concert of sacred music was given at the Borough Theatre, Stratford, on Good Friday, by the members of Mr. Ben Greet's "Shamus O'Brien" Company, under the direction of Mr. Frank Tours. Mr. Magrath received an enthusiastic encore for his rendering of Gounod's "There is a green hill," as also did Miss Leonora Braham for her singing of the "Inflammatus" in Rossini's "Stabat Mater," with which work the Concert concluded. Other soloists deserving of mention were Miss Alice McFarlane, Mr. Avalon Collard, and Mr. Frank H. Morton. The orchestra and chorus of the company assisted, and the performance generally reflected great credit on the ability of the conductor, Mr. Frank Tours.

At one of the Concerts Classiques, given on the 2nd ult. at the Salle des Fêtes, Pau, the performance consisted entirely of music by British composers, including Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's overture "The Wood Nymphs," Professor Stanford's "Irish" symphony, Sir A. C. Mackenzie's "Scotch" rhapsody, Mr. Cowen's "Language of Flowers," Sir Herbert Oakeley's "Edinburgh" march, as well as some minor pieces by John Bull, Dr. Arne, and Orlando Gibbons. Some concise biographical notices were appended to the programme leaflet, and the performance, under M. Edouard Brunel's zealous and intelligent direction, proved a most complete success.

The chamber concert given by Mr. René Ortmans on March 27, at the Queen's (Small) Hall, acquired distinction by the first performance in London being given on this occasion of César Franck's String Quartet in D, a work written in 1889, the year before its composer's death, and first performed by the Société Nationale on April 19, 1890. The work comprises four movements, all of which are permeated by a spirit of melancholy and hopeless despair, which renders the work decidedly depressing. The themes, however, possess distinctiveness, and are developed with the skill and earnestness of expression common to the writings of this composer.

The Bermondsey Settlement Choral and Orchestral Union, numbering 200 performers, gave a satisfactory performance of "Israel in Egypt," at the local Town Hall, on the 8th ult., under the skilful conductorship of Mr. John E. Borland. The oratorio, which was given with the original accompaniments, was preceded by the "Occasional" overture. The soloists were Miss Helen Jaxon, Miss Ruby Shaw, Miss Jessie King, Mr. John Probert, Mr. R. E. Miles, and Mr. John McMillan, the two last-named singing the duet "The Lord is a Man of War" with such spirit and judgment that repetition was asked for and obtained.

The People's Palace Choral Society at Mile End, which makes such steady progress under the direction of Mr. C. H. Allen Gill, gave an excellent performance of "The Messiah" on Good Friday. The choruses were sung with much spirit, the attack being in most instances firm, whilst the leading points were well marked. From beginning to end there was no indication of lack of interest either on the part of the singers or the crowded audience. Madame Annie Marriott, Miss Edith Hands, Mr. Arthur Barlow, and Mr. Frank Tebbutt were the soloists, and Mr. B. Jackson presided at the organ.

The third annual chamber music festival is announced to take place on the five days, from the 23rd to the 27th inst., under the auspices of the Beethoven-Haus Society, in Bonn. The opening concert will be devoted to Beethoven, Mozart, and Haydn; the second to Schubert; the third to Brahms; the fourth to Beethoven; and the final one (27th inst.) to Mendelssohn, Schumann, Brahms, and Beethoven. The net proceeds of the concerts will be devoted to three prizes to be awarded for new chamber compositions, which will be produced in connection with next year's Beethoven-Haus performances.

Miss Maude Danks and Miss Hilda Gee, who gave a vocal and violin recital on the 13th ult., at the Steinway Hall, are promising young musicians who, if they continue to study with as much success as they have done up to the present, should acquire esteemed positions in their profession. Miss Danks has a soprano voice of pleasing quality and she articulates distinctly, although at times with an affected pronunciation. Miss Gee has need of greater executive command, but she played some violin music with commendable neatness and expression. Some songs were tastefully sung by Mr. Walter Ford.

The Finsbury Choral Association shows steady progress. At Holloway Hall, on March 25, the performance of the "Redemption" had several points of interest, not the least of which was accurate perception of the spirit pervading the dramatic sections of the trilogy. These were delivered with genuine impulse and vigour. In the reflective numbers, also, Mr. Cecil J. Sharp, the painstaking conductor, had no reason to be ashamed of the vocalists and instrumentalists under his control. The principals included Miss Mabel Berrey, Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Henry Bailey.

Miss Rosa Green, who gave a concert, on the 5th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall, is gifted with a mezzo-soprano voice of rich quality, which has manifestly been well trained, and is used in a manner that denotes musical feeling. Miss Green, according to present custom on such occasions, sang in various languages, and was specially successful in Bemberg's "Chant Hindou" and Vidal's dainty lyric "Printemps Nouveau." Other artists who appeared were Mr. Andrew Black, Mr. Leon Mozin, and the Hillier Belgian String Quartet.

The Guildhall School of Music, having outgrown its accommodation, is about to be enlarged at an estimated cost of £20,500. This extension of premises will include the addition of an orchestral saloon capable of seating 650 persons and twenty-seven new class-rooms. To meet the necessary expenditure the entrance and tuition fees of the pupils are to be slightly raised and an additional two-and-a-half per cent. will be deducted from the amounts paid to the professors. There are at present 3,527 students attending the various classes.

The committee of the Garrett Fund have decided, under the sad circumstances of the death of that eminent musician, to continue their efforts to secure an adequate fund to present to Mrs. Garrett. They have the satisfaction of knowing that no course of action could have been more acceptable to Dr. Garrett himself. It is needless to add that this new arrangement will not change the character of the presentation, beyond making this practical expression of respect for the man, a mark of respect for his memory.

The newly formed Stoke Newington Choral Association, under the able conductorship of Mr. Percy Taylor, followed up its recently recorded successful public début by a second concert, given on March 29, at Morley Hall, Hackney, in aid of the Prince of Wales's Hospital Fund. The programme included the performance of Barnett's cantata "The Ancient Mariner" in the first, and a miscellaneous selection in the second part. Miss Kate Cherry, Miss Lizzie Jones, Mr. Samuel Masters, and Mr. R. E. Miles were the solo vocalists.

Mr. George A. Clinton began, on the 2nd ult., a series of three chamber concerts at the Queen's (Small) Hall. The chief works performed on this occasion were Beethoven's Serenade in D (Op. 25) for flute, violin, and viola, Brahms's Trio in A minor (Op. 114), and Mozart's Clarinet Quintet in A, the instrumentalists taking part being the Concert-giver, Miss Fanny Davies, Messrs. Fransella, Ludwig, Collins, Whitehouse, and Hobday. Miss Bertha Salter was the vocalist.

At Battersea Town Hall, on the 9th ult., Dibdin's ballad opera "The Waterman" was sung as part of an entertainment in aid of the West Lambeth Teachers' Association. The characters were efficiently sustained by Mrs. A. Maule, Mrs. G. Green, Messrs. T. H. Elliott, W. Fox, and Maskell Hardy. The performance was under the direction of the last-named gentleman, whose select choir of twenty-four voices sang the part-music.

A performance of Haydn's "Creation" was given on the 13th ult., at Union Chapel, Islington. The choruses were sung by the members of the Psalmody Class in a manner worthy of high praise, and the solos were excellently sung by Miss Alice Simons, Mr. Charles Chilley, and Mr. Daniel Price. The accompaniments were played upon the organ by Mr. Fountain Meen, and Mr. R. Williamson conducted.

At St. Luke's, Nightingale Lane, Clapham, a very effective rendering of Stainer's "Crucifixion" took place, on the 14th ult. The solos were sympathetically sung by Messrs. W. Bowley (tenor), Claxton Dicks and Hills (bassi). The precision of the choir in the choruses was well marked. Mr. Chase, the indefatigable and painstaking conductor, has ably held the post of organist and choirmaster for the last twenty years.

An interesting feature of the approaching Victorian Era Exhibition, soon to be opened at Earl's Court, will be a series of brass band contests, which have been arranged on a very much larger scale than has ever before been attempted. As the competing bands will be drawn from all parts of the kingdom, with cash prizes amounting to about £800, the contests will doubtless be very attractive and popular. Singers, too, will have every opportunity of proving their skill in a series of grand Choral Competitions, which have been excellently arranged to suit choirs of various sizes and constituents. £280 in money prizes, and a gold medal for the conductor of each winning choir, are some of the attractions offered.

Bach's Passion Music ("St. Matthew") was impressively performed at St. James's, Sussex Gardens, on the 9th ult., under the direction of Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, organist to the church. The soloists were Miss Dove, Miss Mary Barratt, Mr. Gilbert Denis, and Mr. Mervene Dene. Stainer's "Crucifixion" attracted a large congregation at the same church on Good Friday afternoon.

The Royal College of Music has instituted a "Junior Department" for pupils under fourteen years of age. The syllabus announcing this new feature says: "Every effort will be made to arrange the classes so that the general education of the pupils may be interfered with as little as possible." Full particulars may be obtained upon application to the Registrar, at the College.

The new and effective Lenten cantata, "The Cross of Christ," by Mr. Thomas Adams, organist and choirmaster at St. Alban's, Holborn, has twice been successfully performed at St. Michael's Church, Paddington, under the able direction of Mr. Edmund Rogers, the organist and director of the choir. There were large and appreciative congregations.

Stainer's "Crucifixion" was performed at Christ Church, Marylebone, on the 9th ult. The tenor and bass solos were respectively sustained by Mr. Julian Rutt and Mr. Duncan Bernard with great taste and expression. Mr. Fred. J. Chaffer played the organ with great effect, and to his efforts as choirmaster the success of the performance was largely due.

A Committee has been formed to promote a testimonial to Dr. John Storer, who has been lying helpless for some months through serious illness. Subscriptions will be gratefully received by the Secretary, Mr. E. W. Naylor, 35, Oxford Road, N.W.

Stainer's "Crucifixion" was sung at Christ Church, West Green, South Tottenham, on the 8th ult., and Good Friday, under the direction of Mr. A. M. Flack, organist and choirmaster. The soloists were Messrs. C. M. Gaze and J. M. Tonge. Mr. E. Drewett accompanied on both occasions.

A morning concert will be given at 7, St. James's Square, on the 26th inst., in aid of the Rev. Dr. Stainer's Homes for Deaf and Dumb Children, when a number of popular artists have promised to assist.

Mr. John E. West's march "Victoria" will be played by the massed bands of the Guards, under Bandmaster H. F. Dunkerton, at the trooping of the colours on Her Majesty's birthday.

At the University of London, Messrs. Thomas Ely and Percy Rodney Rideout have passed successfully the examination for the degree of Doctor of Music.

Her Majesty the Queen has been graciously pleased to accept the dedication of Sir Herbert Oakeley's "A Golden Reign" and a copy of Mr. Harvey Löhr's patriotic chorus "Britain's Glory."

Herr Franz Rummel, the well-known pianist, has received the title of "Professor" from the Duke of Saxe-Anhalt.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Algiers.—A series of representations of the "Antigone" of Sophocles, and the "Erinyes" of Æschylus, with incidental music by M. Massenet, is to be given at the Antique Theatre in the coming August.

Antwerp. — The first performance of an opera, "Numance," by M. van den Eeden, now in course of being mounted at the Royal Theatre, is looked forward to with much interest here. M. van den Eeden is one of the most talented of modern Belgian musicians, and the composer, inter alia, of a remakable oratorio, "The Last Judgment."

Bâle.—Probably the first among the performances in memory of Brahms now being held throughout the musical world, took place here on the 4th ult., when the "Deutsches Requiem" was given by the choral society under the direction of Dr. Volkland. The performance was in every way excellent and produced a deep impression, not a few of those present being moved to tears.

Bayreuth.—According to the official announcement just made, the leading tenors at the forthcoming Festival performances will be M. van Dyck, of the Viennese Opera; Herr Vogl, the doyen of Bayreuth tenors; Herr Wilhelm Grüning, of Hamburg; and Herr Aloys Burgstaller, the young singer of Bayreuth training, who showed such great promise last year. Miss Brema will be the Kundry in "Parsifal" and probably also the Fricka in the tetralogy. It is stated that the house is completely sold out for the first series of the performances, and for the second nearly so, while for the third series more than one half of the accommodation has already been disposed of.

Berlin.—A new one-act opera, "Enoch Arden," the libretto founded upon Tennyson's poem, by C. W. Marschner, with Victor Hausmann for its composer, was brought out at the Royal Opera on March 27. Herr Hausmann has hitherto been known here only as the composer of some pleasing orchestral pieces, and he cannot be said to have enhanced his reputation by the present score, which is devoid of any characteristic elements, the libretto being likewise wanting in essential dramatic qualities. There was some little show of applause, but the work is not likely to remain in the repertory very long.——The Emperor William centenary was celebrated in a worthy manner, on March 22, in the Memorial Church, with Dr. (now "Professor") Reimann in his accustomed place at the magnificent organ, to which some notable improvements have recently been added. The performance included a Te Deum by Blumner, Schubert's Twenty-third Psalm (sung by the choristers of the Hochschule), a selection from Handel's oratorios, including the "The Lord is a Man of War" (Herren Mödlinger and Krolop), and an exquisite rendering by Dr. Joachim of an Adagio by Bach, while the organist likewise contributed several solo numbers, amongst them Mendelssohn's Sonata in F minor, which has rarely been heard to greater advantage.——The performance, on March 29, by the Philharmonic Choir, under Herr Siegfried Ochs, of Tinel's "Franciscus," is admitted on all sides to have been the finest yet given here, the solo parts also being in excellent hands.——The Philharmonic Orchestra, under Herr Nikisch's direction, will give a series of concerts at the Cirque d'Hiver, Paris, between the 9th and the 16th inst., and will afterwards proceed to Lyons, Strassburg, and some parts of Switzerland. Its reception in the French capital may be looked forward to with some pardonable curiosity.——Count Geza Zichy, the well-known one-armed pianoforte virtuoso, had an audience of the Emperor recently, the director of the Opera, Count Hochberg, being likewise present, when he played extracts from his opera "Alar," which has been accepted for performance here within a few weeks.——Herr H. von Herzogenberg has been appointed to the professorate at the Royal Hochschule, vacated by the recent death of Woldemar Bargiel.

Brussels.—At the Théâtre de la Monnaie performances of M. Vincent d'Indy's "Fervaal" are being continued twice a week, and a successful revival has taken place of Bizet's "Les Pêcheurs de perles." Miss Brema was announced to re-appear in the parts of Orphée and Delila, previous to fulfilling her engagements at Covent Garden Theatre this month. M. d'Indy also conducted one of the recent Ysaye concerts, which included his orchestral legend

"Istar," while the two distinguished violinists, MM. Ysaye and Thomson, gave a superb rendering of Bach's Concerto for two violins.——An interesting performance, given by the Ysaye Concert Society on Holy Thursday, included Wagner's "Liebesmahl der Apostel," the Good Friday music from "Parsifal," and a chorus from César Franck's oratorio "Rebecca." The concert opened, in memory of Brahms, with the "Tragic" overture of the master, and concluded with Wagner's "Kaisermarsch," including the choral portion. The Liège Choral Society "Légia," under M. Sylvain Dupuis's direction, formed the choir.

Budapesth.—The last Philharmonic concert of the season took place, under Dr. Hans Richter, on the 7th ult., and included, as a novelty, a fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra by a young Hungarian composer, A. von Buttykay, which was greatly appreciated. At the conclusion of the concert Dr. Richter was overwhelmed with tokens, floral and otherwise, of the esteem in which he is held here.——Herr Humperdinck was invited to conduct the fiftieth performance, on the 11th ult., at the Royal Opera, of "Hänsel und Gretel," and was most enthusiastically received by a crowded audience. The performance was preceded by two orchestral numbers from his new work, "Die Königskinder," which pleased greatly, particularly the second, intended to illustrate a children's dance.

Carlsruhe.—M. Vincent d'Indy's new opera "Fervaal," recently produced with so much success at Brussels, has been accepted for performance at the Court Theatre, under Herr Mottl's direction. The work is also to be given at Munich, under Herr Richard Strauss.

Cassel.—Mr. Eugene d'Albert's opera "Der Rubin," first produced at Weimar, under the brief conductorship, at the Hof-Theater, of the composer, is announced for performance at the Court Theatre here during the present month.

Christiania.—Madame Bergliot Ibsen, daughter of Björnson and daughter-in-law of the dramatist, who recently took part in a concert given in Paris by Madame Marchesi's pupils, made her public début here as a vocalist on the 6th ult. The occasion was a recital given by Björnson, in the Municipal Hall, of some of Victor Hugo's poems, and the lady, who sang a number of songs by native composers, completely charmed the audience by her sympathetic voice and perfect method.

Darmstadt.—An excellent performance was given, on March 15, by the Musikverein, under Capellmeister De Haan's direction, of Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" and Beethoven's "Missa solemnis," with Mesdames Plüddemann and Beck, Herr Robert Kaufmann, and Dr. Kraus (of Vienna) in the solo parts.—— A young violoncellist, Arnold Földesy, of Budapesth, has been enormously successful in concerts given here recently, and the critical notices in the press are enthusiastic in their praise of his technique and general artistic ripeness. He is only fourteen years of age.

Dresden.—An excellent first performance here of Bruckner's stupendous Te Deum was given, last month, at one of the concerts directed by Herr Nicodé, with the choir reinforced by the Bach-Verein, the Robert Schumann Singakademie, the Neustadt Choral Society, and others. The noble work, replete with religious fervour and, despite its elaborate design, of a truly grand simplicity, produced a profound impression, and will doubtless be heard here again before long.——Rehearsals are going forward at the Royal Opera of Herr Adalbert von Goldschmidt's already much talked of unique music-drama "Gœa," an important portion of which is to be produced here in concert form, with complete orchestra, in the course of the present month.

Florence.—Signor Leoncavallo, the composer of "I Pagliacci," has written a "Hymn to the Muses," which he has dedicated to the tenor, M. van Dyck.

Frankfort-on-Main.—A complete performance, entirely in accordance with Wagner's score, is to be given between the 15th and 20th inst., at the Stadt-Theater, in which several eminent German Wagner interpreters are to take part.

Genoa.—A new season is about to commence at the Politeama with "Mignon," the repertory also including "Les Pêcheurs de perles," "A Santa Lucia," "I Pagliacci," and "Cavalleria Rusticana." Signora Bellincioni and M. Garbin are amongst the leading artists engaged.

Hamburg.—Madame Ingeborg von Bronsart's grand opera "Hiarné" was produced for the first time at the Stadt-Theater, on March 27, with considerable success. The principal vocalists were Fräulein von Mildenburg and Herr Grüning, who, with the composer, received numerous recalls.

Leipzig.—The season of the Gewandhaus Orchestra concerts, under Herr Nikisch, came to a close on the 1st ult., with the twenty-second concert of the series, the principal numbers in the programme being Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Beethoven's Ninth. Herr Nikisch had then but recently returned from Russia, where he conducted several concerts in Moscow and Warsaw with immense success.——Signor Tamagno is expected to make his first German appearance at the Stadt-Theater early in this month, after which he will give representations at Munich, Frankfort, and elsewhere in the fatherland.—— The first authoritative biography of Heinrich Marschner, the composer of "Der Vampyr" and "Templer und Jüdin," has just been published by the firm of Reclam. The author is Dr. Wittmann, keeper of archives at Pressburg, where the composer for some time resided.—— The renovated and partly re-built church of St. John, containing the remains of Sebastian Bach, was newly consecrated on March 28; and on the 4th ult. an inaugurative concert took place here, dedicated entirely to compositions by the great Cantor, and in which the Leipzig "Quartett für Kirchengesang," as well as the choristers of St. John, under the able direction of Cantor Röthig, took part.

Linz.—In accordance with a unanimous resolution passed by the Municipal Council, a monument is to be erected here to the late Anton Bruckner, and a commemorative tablet is to be placed at the house where he resided while holding the organistship at the Cathedral. The council have, moreover, voted the necessary funds for organising a series of some twelve popular concerts devoted to the performance, by the Linz Musikverein, of the principal compositions of the master.

Lübeck.—Herr Ugo Afferni, a well-known musician of Annaberg, has been appointed to the conductorship of the newly founded Philharmonic Society here, a well-endowed institution which starts under conditions of much promise. Frau Afferni-Brammer, the wife of the conductor, and a violinist of note, will likewise be a valuable addition to the musical life of the town.

Mainz.—Mr. Isidore de Lara's opera "Amy Robsart," produced at the Stadt-Theater in the first week of last month, met with a fairly favourable reception. Fräulein Holmy, who appeared in the titular part, was greatly applauded.

Malines.—A somewhat unconventional International competition is to be held here on the 27th prox., when carillonists, professional and amateur, are invited to exhibit their skill on an instrument which, as everyone knows, abounds in Belgium. The concours is to take place in the Church of St. Rombaut, which possesses a very fine carillon, and several prizes will be awarded.

Mannheim.—Eugene d'Albert's opera "Gernot" was produced at the Court Theatre for the first time on the 11th ult., under the direction of the composer, and in the presence of a number of foreign visitors, the house being indeed crowded. The leading female part was most effectively interpreted by Madame d'Albert, and the performance altogether left little to be desired. The reception accorded to the new work of the Scottish pianist-composer was indicative of warmest appreciation, while the press organs agree in assigning to it a prominent place amongst contemporary operatic productions.

Milan.—Puccini's "La Bohème" was produced for the first time at the La Scala Theatre, on March 22. The next novelty here, the Baron Franchetti's "Signor di Pourceaugnac," was announced to be brought out towards the end of last month.——The first Italian performance of "Hansel and Gretel" (here called "Nino e Rita," in accordance with Italian fairy tale books) took place at the Manzoni Theatre, on the 4th ult., before an appreciative audience.

Munich.—Herr Ernst Possart, the Intendant of the Royal Theatre, recently gave an interesting and numerously attended public recital of Tennyson's "Enoch Arden," accompanied on the pianoforte by Herr Richard Strauss, who has written some very effective incidental music to the poem, consisting of a prelude, intermezzos, and melodramatic accompaniments. The recital was repeated on the 13th ult. at Frankfort-on-Main.——An excellent performance of his own compositions was given, on March 31, by Herr Anton Beer, a gifted resident musician, with the co-operation of the pianist, Fräulein Hoffmann and members of the Kaim Orchestra. In a violoncello sonata, a string quartet, and a pianoforte quartet, which constituted the programme, the composer proved himself an earnest musician of marked individuality and was greatly applauded by a numerous audience.——Handel's oratorio "Deborah," for the first time, in Dr. Chrysander's critically revised version, was given on March 29, at the Odeon, by the Oratorio Society, conducted by Professor Gluth, and greatly appreciated. ——The symphony concerts of the Kaim Orchestra will in future be conducted by Herr Weingartner, the ubiquitous Berlin Capellmeister, Herr Zumpe, their former conductor, having accepted the musical directorship at the Royal Theatre, Schwerin. As in the two preceding years, two complete cycles of Beethoven's Symphonies will be given by the Kaim Orchestra during July and August next.

Naples.—Umberto Giordano's opera "Andrea Chénier" was produced at the San Carlo Theatre, on March 20, for the first time, when it met with a brilliant reception. Many numbers had to be repeated, and the composer was recalled no less than thirty times during the evening.

Palermo.—The Royal Conservatorio here has opened a competition amongst former pupils of the Institution, offering a prize of 1,000 lire for an oratorio for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra.

Prague.—M. Safonow, the distinguished director of the Moscow Conservatoire, was the conductor of the third Philharmonic concert of the season, last month, and met with so much appreciation that an additional extra concert was arranged for him by the society. The programmes were almost entirely devoted to Russian composers, and included Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Glazounow's "Chopiniana," and Rimsky-Korsakow's "Scheherezade" suite. The pianist was M. Theodor Koenemann, a pupil of Safonow and an excellent artist, who introduced some interesting pieces by composers of the neo-Russian school.——A performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt" was given, on the 19th ult., by the Tempel Choral Society, under the conductorship of Herr R. Taussig, the solo parts being rendered by members of the German Opera.——Herr Angelo Neumann, the well known impresario, is about to publish an historical record of his, now defunct, "Richard Wagner Theatre," which in its time rendered yeoman service to the cause of the Bayreuth master. A number of letters written by the latter to Neumann will be published in the volume for the first time, and cannot fail to prove highly interesting.

Rome.—The first performance here of Wagner's "Götterdämmerung" took place on March 26, at the Royal Opera, and, notwithstanding an indifferent interpretation, proved a distinct success. With it, the entire Tetralogy has now been placed in the répertoire. Amongst the number of pianists who have made their apearance here recently, one of the most successful has been M. Edouard Zeldenrust, an artist well-known also in London musical circles.

St. Petersburg.—Madame Sigrid Arnoldson has succeeded Madame Sembrich as the star for the time being at the Imperial Italian Opera, and has appeared with immense success in "Faust," "Mignon," "Manon," and "Lakmé."——The famous Viennese Udel Quartet is making a tour in Russia just now, and both here and in Moscow their refined humorous vocal interpretations have been most highly appreciated. The party had the honour to appear before the Dowager Empress at a private concert.——A new four-act opera, "Lenore," was brought out with some success at the Imperial Italian Opera, on March 23. The libretto is a dramatised version of Bürger's well-known ballad, and the composer is M. Jules Kapry, a French musician residing in this capital.

Stuttgart.—Mascagni's two one-act operas, "Zanetto" and "Silvano," were performed for the first time at the Court Theatre on March 28, but cannot be said to have attracted much attention at the house where the composer of "Cavalleria" gained one of his most notable German triumphs.

Vienna.—Closely following upon the recent one hundredth performance of Goldmark's "Die Königin von Saba," at Budapesth, a similar event has been recorded, on March 21, at the Imperial Opera, where the work was first produced on any stage just twenty-two years ago. The composer, who is very popular with the Viennese, was the object of numerous ovations on the present occasion. Frau von Ehrenstein and Herr Winkelmann were in the principal parts. Cornelius's comic opera "Der Barbier von Bagdad" was revived on the 5th ult., under Dr. Hans Richter's direction, with a success which renders it the more inexplicable why this charming work is not more frequently heard.——Herr Gustav Mahler, of the Hamburg Opera, and formerly of that of Budapesth, has been appointed to a conductorship at the Imperial Opera, probably with a view to the impending retirement of Herr Jahn. Herr Mahler, who first became generally known by his ingenious completion of the fragmentary score of Weber's comic opera "The Three Pintos," is a conductor of considerable talent and experience, he having also been some time director of the German Opera at Covent Garden. Pending the actual retirement of Herr Jahn, there will be four conductors now at the Imperial Opera.——The principal event in the concert-room was the series of performances given last month by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, under the direction respectively of Weingartner, Nikisch, and Felix Mottl, and which were highly appreciated. Among the soloists taking part were MM. Sauer and Busoni, Professor Heermann (of Frankfort), Miss Camilla Landi, and Frau Mottl.——Richard Strauss's symphonic poem "Zarathustra," produced here for the first time at the Philharmonic concert of March 24, under Dr. Richter, met with an admirable performance, but left the audience in a state of bewilderment.——In memory of Brahms, the composer's "Deutsches Requiem" was performed by the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, on the 11th ult.

OBITUARY.

A familiar figure has been removed from St. Paul's Cathedral and its precincts in the person of the Rev. William Sparrow Simpson, D.D., F.S.A., whose death, we regret to record, took place on March 28, at the age of sixty-nine. Dr. Simpson, who was a Cambridge man, held curacies at St. Mark's, Kennington, and Chesterford. In 1857 he became rector of St. Matthew's, Friday Street, and subsequently, and until the time of his death, rector of St. Vedast, Foster Lane. The deceased clergyman, who received his D.D. degree from the Archbishop of Canterbury, was one of the librarians of Lambeth Palace. Dr. Simpson's memorable connection with St. Paul's Cathedral began in 1861, when he was appointed a Minor Canon and Librarian. The library of the Cathedral was the object of his devoted care. He catalogued it, and all its treasures, contents, and peculiarities were part of his daily life. His other appointments at St. Paul's were Succentor (March 31, 1876 to 1885), Junior Cardinal (1878-81), and Sub-Dean. It is more especially in connection with his office of Succentor (the acting deputy of the Precentor) that Dr. Simpson's death claims notice in these columns. Only those who worked with him know with what thoroughness and tact he discharged those important duties, and Sir John Stainer would be the first to acknowledge the value of his zealous co-operation and unwearying enthusiasm in the cause of music in our Metropolitan Cathedral. The reports of the music which he presented from time to time to the Dean and Chapter, besides being valuable printed records of splendid achievements, show that earnest spirit which was characteristic of the man. He further showed his practical interest in choirmen by being one of the treasurers of the Choir Benevolent Fund. Dr. Simpson was a born antiquary; his best known works in that department of study are "Chapters in the history of Old St. Paul's" (1881) and "Gleanings from Old St. Paul's" (1889). He was greatly beloved in both public and private life, and leaves behind him a very fragrant memory. The interment took place at Norwood Cemetery.

We have to record the death, in London, on the 3rd ult., after a brief illness and at the early age of thirty-two, of Henry Erskine Allon, a composer of considerable promise. He was the only surviving son of the late Rev. Dr. Henry Allon, of Union Chapel, Islington, the well-known divine, and, in association with the late Dr. Gauntlett, editor of the "Congregational Psalmist." After graduating at Cambridge, Erskine Allon studied for the Bar, but soon elected to devote himself exclusively to music. His compositions, about thirty in number, include some very graceful pianoforte studies, as well as six cantatas, one of which, "Annie of Lochroyan," was performed by the Philharmonic Society in 1893, and a similar work met with a very favourable reception at a recent concert of the Highbury Philharmonic Society. An earnest artist, aiming at a high ideal, his powers had been rapidly developing of late, and his premature loss is the more distinctly to be deplored.

One of the most justly esteemed musicians and musical authors of Italy, Girolamo Alessandro Biaggi, died at Florence, on March 21, at the age of seventy-eight. Born at Milan, he studied at the Conservatoire of that town, and for a time occupied the post of orchestral conductor, during which period he composed an opera, "Martino della Scala," and several sacred works. Subsequently, however, he devoted himself almost exclusively to critical or historical labours. He was the editor, at one time, of the Italia Musicale, of Milan, and afterwards, having taken up his residence in Florence, he became the musical critic of the Nazione and of the leading periodical, La Nuova Antologia, in which capacity, albeit of somewhat reactionary tendencies, he wielded considerable influence and authority by his erudition and lofty conception of his art. Biaggi, who occupied for many years a professorship of musical history and æsthetics at the Royal Institution of Florence, was the author, amongst other works, of an important volume, "Della musica religiosa e delle questioni inerenti." An intimate friend of Rossini, he had been engaged for some years past upon an elaborate biography of that master, which, however, unfortunately remains incompleted.

The musical life of Melbourne has sustained a loss by the death of Signor Pietro Cecchi, the distinguished singing master, the principal teacher of Madame Melba, who died in that town, somewhat suddenly, on the 4th ult. He was a native of Rome and began his career as an architect in the service of Pope Pius IX. Mixed up in the Italian revolutionary movement of 1848, he was obliged to quit the Papal territory, and being gifted with a well cultivated tenor voice he tried his fortune on the operatic stage. He appeared in leading parts at Turin, at La Scala, Milan, and elsewhere in Italy with great success; he also toured in the United States and on several occasions sang in London. For the last twenty-six years Cecchi had taken up his abode in Melbourne, where he was highly esteemed as a vocalist and teacher, and was a most popular figure in society.

Francesco Quaranta, an Italian composer of considerable merit, died at Milan on March 26, having just completed his forty-ninth year. He was a pupil of the Conservatoire at Naples, his native place, and for many years had established himself at Milan as a much-sought vocal teacher. He was the composer of a successful opera, "Ettore Fieramosca," of a Mass with orchestral accompaniment, and of a number of charming songs.

The death is announced, on March 13, at Dresden, of Bruno Ramann, a much esteemed musical and vocal professor in the Saxon capital, where he had resided the last twenty-seven years. A highly-cultured artist, he made himself favourably known both as a composer, chiefly of pianoforte pieces and four-part songs, and as a writer of poetry. He was born at Erfurt in 1832, and was a pupil of Moritz Hauptmann, in Leipzig.

Eduard Kulke, a well-known novelist and author on musical subjects, died in Vienna, on March 20, at the age of sixty-six. He was for many years the musical critic of the Viennese Fremdenblatt and the Vaterland, and one of the earliest champions of Richard Wagner.

John Siddons, of Snarestone, near Atherstone, England's oldest chorister, died on the 2nd ult. For eighty-three years he sang in the Snarestone Church choir, under five different rectors. Four of the deceased's sons, five grandsons, and three brothers have been members of the same choir. His eldest son was organist for forty years, and the deceased was parish clerk of Snarestone for fifty years.

We record the death, last month, of Mrs. G. H. Johnstone, of Headingly, Hamstead, Birmingham, a well-known patron of musical art and hospitable entertainer of artists taking part in the Birmingham Festivals, including Gounod, Dvorák, Christine Nilsson, Joseph Maas, Marie Roze, Albani, Patey, and many other celebrities.

Dr. Jacob Bradford, the composer of the oratorio "Judith," and other works, together with a quantity of organ music, died on the 19th ult., after a brief illness of only a week's duration, and still in the prime of life. Dr. Bradford was well known as a Church organist, holding various appointments, including that of St. Mary's, Newington. He was preparing a performance of his "Song of Jubilee" up to nearly the end of his life. Many friends will mourn the loss of this worthy and amiable artist.

Jules Jouy, the famous writer of chansons, died in an asylum in Paris, on March 20. He was one of the founders of the Chat-Noir, and his songs, though weird and fantastic, were often full of grace and originality, as, for instance, his "Ballade des Agents" and "Les enfants font pleurer les mères," while nearly all of them enjoyed immense popularity. He was originally a gilder of porcelain, and was proud of being called the "working-man poet."

We have also to record the following deaths:—

On March 14, at Cincinnati (U.S.), John H. Koehnken, the most celebrated organ-builder in the Western States, aged seventy-eight.

On March 15, at Berlin, Adalbert Ueberlee, "musik-director," over thirty years organist at the Dorotheen-Stadt Church, composer of oratorios and operas, in his sixtieth year.

On March 16, while travelling in Germany, Anna Melan, chief of an extensive musical instrument factory at Helsingfors (Finland).

On March 18, at Hanover, Anton Scheele, musical critic, formerly popular operatic singer, aged eighty-two.

On March 22, at Munich, Carl Brulliot, professor at the Royal Akademie der Tonkunst, formerly scenic manager at the Royal Opera.

On March 22, at Magdeburg, Hermann Tuch, of the firm of Tuch and Geyer, court pianoforte makers, an excellent pianist.

On March 25, at Mantua, Antoldi Alessandro, composer, vocal professor at public schools.

On March 26, at Edward Street, Ampthill Square, Jessie Dunstan (Jessie Royd), soprano vocalist, eldest daughter of the late John Dunstan.

On March 30, at Bergamo, Francesco Manetta, organist of St. Alessandro, of Colonna, composer and teacher.

On March 31, at Cremona, Bartolo Piatti, flautist and theatrical manager, the friend and early champion of the works of Ponchielli.

On the 1st ult., at Berlin, Fritz Friebe, musical director, aged thirty-five.

On the 2nd ult., at Zürich, Bruno Brückmann, musical author and composer, for some time resident in London, for the last sixteen years in Zürich, aged seventy.

On the 4th ult., at Bonn, Professor Johannes Wolf, musical director at the University.

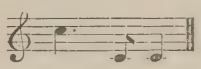
On the 4th ult., at Arnstadt, Carl Ermer, ducal musical director, aged sixty-one.

On the 5th ult., at The Hague, W. van der Linden, Royal musical director, composer for military band, aged fifty-two.

On the 7th ult., at Dresden, August Ehrlich, orchestral conductor, principal of the musical academy bearing his name.

On the 10th ult., at Haarlem, H. van der Eijken, for many years organist of the Lutheran Church, composer of masses, aged sixty-eight.

The Marlborough Place Amateur Orchestral Society gave its third annual concert, under the direction of Mr. Paul Oppenheimer, on March 30. The spirited and finished execution of the "March of the Priests" from "Athalie" and of Mozart's Symphony, No. 35, testify to the great progress the society has made under its gifted conductor. The orchestra also performed the Largo from Mackenzie's "Benedictus," and the "Nocturne" and "Pavane" from German's music to "Romeo and Juliet."



CORRESPONDENCE.

"TAMPERING WITH THE CLASSICS?"

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—The London critics have surely been caught napping at last! At his concert on the 13th ult., Herr Mottl availed himself of Wagner's suggestion for re-scoring certain ineffective passages in the Scherzo and Finale of Beethoven's Choral Symphony. That the effect was a great improvement no one with ears to hear can deny; but there are, doubtless, many people who prefer Beethoven pure and simple, however ineffective, to Beethoven cum Wagner, however effective, just as Cromwell wanted a portrait painted of Cromwell pure and simple, "warts and all"! But how was it that, as far as I am aware, not one voice was raised in the press to protest against what would, no doubt, have been called by very ugly names if the course taken by Herr Mottl had been announced beforehand? How about their intimate knowledge of the work to let this "tampering with Beethoven" pass unnoticed? You spoke of the most important of Wagner's emendations in your issue of July, 1896, where your special correspondent, at the Lower Rhenish Musical Festival at Düsseldorf, described the effect of a performance under Herr J. Buths. He wrote:—

"Herr Buths had the courage (the impertinence some may call it) to adopt Wagner's suggested change in the instrumentation of the passage in the Scherzo where the second subject is played by the wood-wind against the ff figure—for all the strings in four octaves. Nobody who has heard this passage played by a modern orchestra of, say, sixty or seventy strings against eight or twelve wood-wind instruments can affirm that he has heard the effect which Beethoven intended. For either the theme is altogether drowned by the strings or the latter must play piano, which I fancy is not in the least what the composer wanted. For to me it is clear beyond any doubt that Beethoven at this passage wished for an outburst of unbridled, boisterous gaiety, and to make the strings play softly appears a ludicrous misinterpretation of his intentions. To remedy this miscalculated orchestral effect of Beethoven's, Wagner suggested that the horns, which are only employed to mark the already very pronounced rhythm, should strengthen the wood-wind, and this is what Herr Buths did. He made his eight horns play the theme ff, and his eighty-eight strings hammered out their 'figure' with all their might without being able to cover the melody."

The other important alteration is in the "fanfare" in the Finale, directly after the opening discord. A glance at the full score will show that here the trumpets play only "open" notes, and thus cut the melodic phrase to pieces, as it were, and disturb its flow in a most irritating, jolting manner. If Beethoven had had the modern valve trumpet at his disposal who can doubt that he would have assigned the whole theme to them, instead of only a note or two here and there? At any rate, this is what Wagner suggested and Herr Mottl carried out! Personally, I hope that in future all conductors will follow Herr Mottl's courageous example, whether the critics profess to be "shocked" or not. The strange thing to me is, Why were they not shocked this time?—Yours faithfully,

West Kensington, W.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—All who take sufficient interest in the orchestra to occasionally follow the performance of a symphony or an overture with a full score, must have noticed that the arpeggios and scales so frequently written for the violoncellos and double basses in ff passages for full orchestra are, as a rule, totally inaudible. For example, in the Finale of Beethoven's C minor Symphony, just before the end, occurs the following:—

Here the violoncellos and double basses are assisted by the violas and bassoons, but they are, nevertheless, completely drowned by the ff of the trumpets, trombones, and drums. To make the passage properly heard the violoncellos and double basses would probably have to number something more than a dozen each, and an orchestra with the strings on this basis would be altogether too expensive for ordinary occasions. But why not help the double basses with some such instrument as the B flat double bass of the military band (preferably in C and constructed on the principle of Besson's cornophones)? The smooth tone of such an instrument would blend admirably with the string double basses, and I suppose it would be a very easy matter to make a brass instrument of a somewhat more penetrating tone (but not so blatant as the trombone) to double the violoncellos—indeed, I think I heard such an instrument at Besson's some time ago; the euphonium, of course, would never do.

Against this suggestion the usual cry may be raised about "tampering with the classics"; but can it seriously be supposed that Beethoven did not intend the above passage to be heard, or that he would object to making it heard by supporting the string bass with a brass bass of similar tone? That he did not make use of such instruments is sufficiently explained by the fact that they did not exist at the time he wrote. But even if we refuse to have a Beethoven symphony performed except by just those instruments for which it was originally scored, it cannot be denied that a brass bass of less incisive tone than the trombone, and more capable than the slide trombone of executing rapid passages, would be of great value to modern composers, for they might then write passages like the example I have quoted with the advantage (not possessed by Beethoven, Weber, &c.) of having them heard by the audience.—Yours respectfully,

W. F. Dunton.

THE TRIUNE ELEMENT IN BEETHOVEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Your kind notice of my paper read before the Musical Association on March 9 hardly conveys a correct impression of what I said on a few points. May I, therefore, ask you to allow me to make the following corrigenda?

(1.) "In the second class the latter part of the repeated phrase was sometimes heard twice." Here is evident confusion of classes 2 and 3. Class 2 has nothing to do with phrases, but only concerns such small fragments as cadences, &c. It is in class 3 that there are certain examples in which a two-fold repetition of the latter half of a phrase is substituted for one repetition of the whole.

(2.) The three-fold repetition occurs but seldom after the "Appassionata," until we come to the last Sonata.

(3.) The examples in Clementi are of three-fold repetition, not triune element. I particularly stated that it was the triunity (as opposed to mere three-fold repetition) in Beethoven's examples that specially impressed me.

(4.) It was only Mr. Gilbert Webb who raised the question whether Beethoven employed this device more than other idiomatic forms. Mr. Southgate, Mr. Shedlock, and Dr. Warriner raised many other interesting points; but, to quote the words of the chairman (Mr. Southgate), I "answered all the questions satisfactorily."

Yours faithfully,
George Langley.

[In the necessarily short notice of the lecture it was almost impossible to explain all the details of so elaborate a theme.—Ed., M.T.]

WEBBE—PAXTON—DANBY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Allow me, through your columns, to appeal to glee singers in general to support a scheme which I have undertaken for restoring the monuments of these three composers in old St. Pancras Churchyard. The graves of all three lie close together. The inscriptions upon the tombs of Danby and Paxton are illegible, but by the help of the little book of epitaphs, published in 1869, they can be re-cut. The stone which marked the grave of Webbe has completely disappeared. Mr. D. Baptie and doubtless others remember its position in recent years, but to-day it cannot be found. I propose, with the permission of the St. Pancras Vestry, to put up a small granite obelisk to the memory of Webbe, at a cost of £25. The re-cutting of the other inscriptions (they are long) will cost £5. I am confident that the sum will speedily be subscribed. I shall be happy to acknowledge any contributions, and to invite subscribers to the unveiling of the monuments in July, when, if all is well, I will get a choir to sing a glee by each of the three composers.—I am, Sir, &c.,

J. Spencer Curwen.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

T. R. P. (Eastbourne).—We have no intention of re-opening the subject of "God save the Queen," even in this eventful year, unless some absolutely fresh facts are forthcoming. The history of our National Anthem was fully discussed by Mr. W. H. Cummings in these columns from March to July, 1878.

Bracondale. — Spohr's "Calvary" (originally called "Crucifixion") was produced in England at the Vocal Concerts, Hanover Square Rooms, London, March 28, 1837, under Edward Taylor; thus the performance at the Norwich Musical Festival of the same year was the second in England, and not the first, as is often stated.

Choirmaster (Dundee).—Without expressing any opinion upon the notation of the chord, we think that your tenors will sing their note better in tune if they think of it as F sharp, instead of G flat, especially as it rises to G natural.

H. B.—We shall be very pleased to give you the earliest known form of the tune, perhaps in our next number. We are very anxious to give any such information to our readers if it is of general interest.

Westward Ho!—Kingsley's "Oh! that we two were maying" will be found in his "Saint's Tragedy," Act ii., Scene 9.

Norseman.—Longfellow's "Sir Morten of Fogelsang" ("Tales of a Wayside Inn") is doubtless an imaginary person, as the name is not in Norse literature. The refrain, "Dead rides Sir Morten of Fogelsang," in Mr. Edward Elgar's cantata "King Olaf," is not printed within brackets in the original version of the poem.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of Concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

After an instrumental and choral introduction, the work is divided into four parts, severally entitled "The Incarnation of the King," "The Kingly entry into Jerusalem," "The Kingly sacrifice," and "The triumph of the King." The music is written on the system of representative themes, in the manipulation of which much skill is shown. The soloists were Mrs. Alfred Nash, Miss Coleman, Mr. Moat, and Mr. Cox. VICTORIAN ERA EXHIBITION, EARL'S COURT, LONDON, S.W.

MAY TO OCTOBER, 1897.

In Commemoration of Her Majesty's Diamond Jubilee Year.

Director-General:

IMRE KIRALFY.

GRAND CHORAL COMPETITIONS.

The Honorary Committee of the Music Section of the Victorian Era Exhibition includes the names of the most distinguished persons in the latter-day annals of Music in England, headed by SIR ARTHUR SULLIVAN, Mus. Doc., R.A.M.

(Chairman),

SIR ALEXANDER C. MACKENZIE, Mus. Doc., Principal of the Royal Academy of Music (Vice-Chairman).

The Choral Sub-Committee consists of the following gentlemen:—W. G. McNAUGHT, Esq., Mus. Doc., F.R.A.M.; W. H. CUMMINGS, Esq., F.S.A., Hon. The proposed series of Competitions is associated with a holiday for the Choirs. London will be especially attractive to singers this year. They will, moreover, if taking part in the Contests at Earl's Court, be enabled to travel at a considerable reduction from the usual excursion rates. Arrangements are also being made whereby the Railway Companies will allow such privileged visitors to London to prolong their stay for a greater period than has hitherto been permitted, while special return trains will also be arranged for. In short, very exceptional facilities are being provided for this unique occasion. There cannot be another Diamond Jubilee in our time, and there cannot be another series of Jubilee Choral Prize Winners.

The Exhibition itself will be exceedingly interesting. Competitors will be admitted free to the Exhibition, and will have access to the side shows at special reduced rates, and at half price to the Big Wheel; and also reduced prices for refreshments.

The vast Empress Theatre will be devoted to special Musical Festivals and Competitions every week.

THE

MAID OF ASTOLAT

BY

C. SWINNERTON HEAP.

THIRD EDITION now Ready. Price 3s. 6d., in paper.

Extract from Birmingham Daily Post, November 20, 1896.

"Dr. Heap revels in his choral writing, and reaches the highest elevation in the chorus descriptive of the approach of the dead Elaine lying in the sombre barge. . . . The performance made a profound impression on the audience. . . . The demonstration at the close showed that there had been no error of judgment in reviving this cantata. We have no time for critical comment at this moment; but, having heard the composition four times, we do not hesitate to class it among works accepted as masterly."

Chorus Parts, and a number of Lithographed Copies, Tonic Sol-fa Edition, may be obtained on hire.

ELEMENTS OF MUSIC. Crown 8vo, 1s.

"In the space of some fifty pages, the reader will find all that is necessary to be known about the pitch of notes, intervals and scales, rests, time and abbreviations; and will, we doubt not, also find how much there is of which he was ignorant concerning these subjects, although he had already flattered himself that he had mastered their elements a long time ago."—Saturday Review.

THE ROLLING SEASONS
A New Sacred Cantata. By CALEB SIMPER.

Price 1s. 6d. net. Tonic Sol-fa, 1s. net.

Band Parts are also printed for Strings, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon, 2 Horns, 2 Cornets, 2 Trombones, Timpani, and Organ.

With the exception of Two Hymns and a Carol, the words are selected from the Holy Scriptures. The music, both Vocal and Instrumental, is attractive, interesting, and not difficult. It requires Four Soloists and Full Chorus, and occupies 35 minutes in performance. This Cantata may be rendered with Organ Accompaniment only, but the Orchestral Parts add greatly to the effect. It is especially suitable for Church use at Whitsuntide and Harvest-tide.

OPINIONS:—"We are all charmed with Cantata. My choir like it so much."—"The 'Rolling Seasons' is splendid."—"Cantata is delightful. I am sure it will have a large sale."—"We have Cantata in rehearsal, and like it very much."—"Cantata is bold, effective, and unique; we are much pleased with it."—"'Rolling Seasons' is exceedingly pretty."—"I like Cantata much, and shall prepare it for Whitsuntide."—"I am simply charmed with the Cantata; you have certainly achieved a great success."—"I consider it a ring studded with Gems."—"A perfect specimen of what a Cantata should be," &c.

TOILERS OF THE DEEP

CANTATA

FOR FEMALE VOICES

Verse by JAMES STRANG

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

CONTENTS.

Introduction and Chorus—"Toiling and toss'd on the restless sea."
Cradle Song—"Come, my baby, come away."
Chorus—"Oh, ho! for the winds that blow."
Ballad—"A mermaid dwelt in days of old."
Trio—"The twilight grey is falling."
Song—"O manly hearts that brave the sea."
Chorus—"Dark and darker grows the night."
Chorus—"A prayer for those at sea."
Intermezzo—"Break of day."
Duet—"Through golden mists of morn."

"This charming work was composed for the pupils of King Edward VI.'s High School for Girls, Birmingham, and bears all the best marks of the composer's characteristically graceful style. The libretto is of a high order of merit, and worth the music, which from first to last is attractive and without a dull page."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

SIX ACTION SONGS

MARY HUTCHINSON

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"These delightful songs were written and composed for, and are affectionately dedicated to, the children of the Kindergarten Section of the Church of England College for Girls at Edgbaston. Were there naught else to recommend them, the six titles would invite for the songs universal acceptance. Who could resist 'Haymakers,' 'Fairy Bells,' 'Flower Fairies,' 'The English Flag,' 'Calling the Cows,' and 'Fishermen'? We confess to a desire to see some of these songs done as the accompanying 'rubric' suggests. In 'Haymakers' the boys should be scythe-carriers, their action that of mowing; the little girls should imitate raking. This, with the quaint and pretty melody, and the refrain, 'Work, work, clearly we call; work, work, steadily all,' must be a grateful vision to parents, and a pleasant recreation to children, who may thank their stars that they have been born in a day which has a Mary Hutchinson and an Alfred R. Gaul to further gild the golden hours of childhood."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

YOUR FATHER'S BOREEN*

HUMOROUS IRISH SONG

THE MUSIC BY

ALICIA ADÉLAÏDE NEEDHAM,

Composer of "An Irish Lullaby," "Maureen," "The Exile's Return." &c., &c.

Oh! don't be beguilin' my heart with your wilin',
You've tried that same thrick far too often before,
And, by this blest minnit an' day that is in it,
I'll take right good care that you'll try it no more!
You thought that so slily you walked with O'Reilly,
By man and by mortal unheard and unseen,
While your hand he kept squeezin', and you looked so pleasin',
Last Saturday night in your father's boreen.

His thricks and his schamin' has set you a-dhramin',
That anyone blessed with their eyesight may see,
For you're not the same creature you once wor by nature,
And they that are thraitors won't do, faith, for me!
Tho' it is most disthressin' to think that a blessin'
Was just about fallin' down plump on the scene,
When a cunnin' culloger, as black as an ogre,
Upset all your hopes in a dirty boreen.

Och! it is most ungrateful, unkind, and unfaithful,
When you very well know that I gave the go-by Both to pride and to pleasure, temptation and treasure,
To dress all my looks by the light of your eye.
Oh! 'tis Mary Mullally, that lives in the valley,—
'Tis she that would say how ill-used I have been,
And she's not the deludher to smile and to soother
And then walk away to her father's boreen.

I send you your garter, for now I'm a martyr,
And keepsakes and jims are the least of my care,
So, when things are exchangin', since you took to rangin',
I'll throuble you, too, for that lock of my hair.
Sure I know by its shakin', my heart is a-breakin',
You'll make me a corpse, when I'd make you a queen,
But as sure as I'm livin', it's you I'll be givin'
A terrible fright, when I haunt the boreen.

* A little road (pronounced bor-yeen).

SCENES FROM THE SAGA OF KING OLAF

BY

H. W. LONGFELLOW AND H. A. ACKWORTH, C.I.E.

SET TO MUSIC FOR

SOPRANO, TENOR, AND BASS SOLI, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

BY

EDWARD ELGAR.

(Op. 30.)

Vocal Score, Price Three Shillings.
Tonic Sol-fa Edition (Choruses only), One Shilling and Sixpence.
Vocal Parts, each One Shilling and Sixpence. Full Score and Wind Parts, MS. String Parts, 23s.

THE TIMES.

There is no gainsaying the power that lies in such a number as "The Wraith of Odin," with its weird refrain; this, unquestionably, is the finest number in the cantata. . . . There is strength and virility in the composition, and the orchestra is generally treated with almost a masterly hand.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Elgar knows how to write effectively, both for vocal solo and chorus, and, as a matter of fact, he shows a peculiar sensitiveness to the effects which can be produced by such means. This is, perhaps, the most important revelation made by the new work, because found in connection with a rare gift of writing for the orchestra. . . . To sum up a necessarily hurried judgment, "King Olaf" is a work of high importance, one which should turn expectant eyes upon its composer as a musician within whose reach, apparently, lies no common distinction. . . . Almost every number was applauded fervently, and, at the close, composer, soloists, band, and choir were privileged to divide amongst them the honours of an enthusiastic demonstration. . . . It is something to gain the ear of the public for an important essay, and even more to call out the enthusiasm of those who interpret. We congratulate Mr. Elgar, and desire for him many such triumphs in the course of the career which he pursues so modestly yet so devotedly. He was applauded with enthusiasm at the close of the performance.

STANDARD.

The music is remarkable for the vividness with which it illustrates and reflects the wild spirit of the text. In some places it is most stirring and impressive, and "The Challenge to Thor" is one of the finest choral numbers of modern times. The setting of the ballad "The Wraith of Odin" also shows rare power of suggesting the weird and uncanny in musical tones, and many other portions of the work testify to Mr. Elgar's lively fancy and great command of expression. Melodies of an attractive character abound, and the orchestra is written for in a most picturesque and musician-like manner.

MORNING POST.

The second chorus, "I am the God Thor," is magnificent in its bold ruggedness and forcible expression, and several other choral numbers are written with a vividness and intensity that are most stirring. The solos are no less dramatically conceived, and admirable contrasts and the highly picturesque scoring combine to endow the work with fascinating interest.

DAILY NEWS.

The choruses are, as a rule, very effectively written, particularly that devoted to the challenge of the god Thor, the two choral ballads, and the chorus in which the death of Olaf is described. The tenor solo descriptive of Olaf's return and two duets for soprano and tenor are also amongst the more important numbers. Mr. Elgar himself conducted the cantata, which had a splendid reception. . . . When the final chorus had been sung the audience, choir, and band simultaneously burst into enthusiastic applause and continued cheering loudly after the composer had left the platform.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

I have no hesitation in pronouncing it the most notable addition to native productions the year has hitherto afforded. . . . Mr. Elgar throughout his latest work makes considerable use of representative themes. He knows their value, and happily in his hands they are not dangerous tools. The ingenuity with which he employs them is remarkable, and as the majority are simple and well defined they are readily recognisable at any stage of the story. Great reliance is placed upon the orchestra for the expression of ideas growing out of the dramatic situation, the instrumentation being always vivid and bold in colouring. Of the grateful nature of the work for the chorus I have already spoken. To sum up, "King Olaf" is a work deserving another hearing as soon as possible.

ATHENÆUM.

Musicians spoke in praise of Mr. Edward Elgar's short oratorio "The Light of Life," produced at Worcester recently, and the Malvern composer has far surpassed his previous achievement in his latest work performed on Friday morning. The writing is from first to last luminous in design, picturesque in the orchestral colouring, and extremely felicitous as regards the vocal parts for soli and chorus.

OBSERVER.

There is good reason for the hearty applause with which the work was received, for it is melodious, vigorous, and musicianlike music. . . . Some of the choruses, notably "The Challenge of Thor," attain a very high standard of musical expression. . . . "The Wraith of Odin" and many other numbers also unmistakably show remarkable power of impressively illustrating dramatic incidents.

GLOBE.

He is at his best in the choral parts of the work, which are almost invariably vigorous, original, and effective.

THE VILLAGE ORGANIST

A New Series of Pieces for Church and General Use

EDITED BY

J. STAINER

AND

F. CUNNINGHAM WOODS.

PRICE ONE SHILLING EACH BOOK.

PREFACE.

THERE exists already an abundant supply of original compositions and arrangements suitable for performance on large and comprehensive organs, but the many organists who have only a small instrument at their disposal in country churches often have some difficulty in finding short and easy Voluntaries suitable for their own use and the instruction of their pupils. It is hoped that "The Village Organist" (which will be issued in shilling numbers) may supply this want, so much felt by that valuable and zealous class of church-workers to whom the work is inscribed. The Editors have endeavoured to bring together a collection of pieces which they trust will prove to be at once simple, without being uninteresting, and effective where the instrumental resources are limited.

MR. HENRY BEAUMONT

(DRAMATIC TENOR)

PRESS OPINIONS OF MR. BEAUMONT'S RECENT IMPERSONATION OF WAGNER'S "TANNHÄUSER."

(First Night.)

"Round Tannhäuser the interest centres; and to say that Mr. Henry Beaumont held the structure of music and story steadily together, is to pay him a less handsome compliment than is his due. He sang and acted extremely well; and when experience has provided him with further familiarity and confidence in his task, his additional abandon in executing it will add greatly to the credit which marked his praiseworthy effort last night."—Manchester Guardian, Sept. 26, 1896.

"Mr. Henry Beaumont has added to his many successful impersonations as Tannhäuser, whose adventures demand the exercise of great dramatic art as well as vocal culture."—Manchester Courier, Sept. 26, 1896.

"Mr. Henry Beaumont in the title-rôle had the work well in hand, and sang with all the varying shades of art which the character demands—despair, anguish, and passion—and practically held the success of the whole performance in his own hands, withstanding the severe strain of the three hours' performance without giving evidence of the excessive wear and tear."—Sheffield Independent, Oct. 9, 1896.

"In the title-rôle Mr. Henry Beaumont did work that enhanced his reputation a hundredfold. The long recitative of the Pilgrimage to Rome, in the third act, was given in a manner beyond all praise, and if there were nothing else to commend him for—and there was a great deal—this alone was enough to pre-eminently distinguish him. It was without question the most striking and effective solo part of the entire performance."—Hull Eastern Morning News, Oct. 31, 1896.

"Of the vocal performance it is really no more than simple justice to say that a better has rarely been given in recent years. The Tannhäuser of Mr. Henry Beaumont came with surprise, even upon those who already knew him to be a good artist. His beautiful and perfectly trained tenor voice never was heard to such great advantage. In the difficult declamatory music it told with marked clearness of enunciation and purity of tone, and in those passages, notably in the Hall of Minstrelsy, where pathos and dramatic fervour are required, he quite surpassed himself. He gained the chief honours of the night."—Dublin Freemans Journal, Jan. 1, 1897.

"Mr. Henry Beaumont is surprising even critical Dublin by his remarkable impersonation of Tannhäuser; his singing of the 'Story of the Pilgrimage,' in the third act, is perfect in dramatic intensity and expressive feeling."—Irish Society, Jan. 16, 1897.

"TANNHÄUSER."—"The production was something more than a success. It was followed with rapt attention by a crowded house, people being content with standing room in most parts, and the enthusiasm which was demonstrated at the conclusion of the performance was quite unique, the audience remaining, in spite of the late hour, to testify their approval, and the curtain having to be raised thrice to allow the principals to acknowledge the tribute of praise so spontaneously bestowed. The burden of the work naturally fell upon Mr. Henry Beaumont in the title-rôle. He is not unknown to Portsmouth audiences, but the dramatic fervour with which he sang and acted was a revelation, and at the end of an exacting performance his tenor rang out as true and as perfectly under control as at the commencement."—Portsmouth Southern Daily Mail, March 18, 1897.

"As the minstrel Tannhäuser, Mr. Henry Beaumont was thoroughly equal to the exacting rôle, his impassioned acting no less than his refined singing contributing materially to the generally striking result obtained. The clear resonant quality of his voice lent itself perfectly to the interpretation of the emotional and declamatory music associated with the character, and in the love scenes with Venus and Elizabeth, in the exciting passages at the tournament, and, finally, in the intensely dramatic episode at the shrine upon his return from his pilgrimage, he displayed conspicuous talent as actor and vocalist."—Eastbourne Sussex Daily Mail, April 1, 1897.

"Mr. Edward Iles, the possessor of a highly cultivated and mellow baritone, gave evidence of exceptional taste and appreciation of his art. His voice is full of music, and he thoroughly understands how to use it."—Morning Leader.

"Mr. Iles chose two songs from Mascagni, which he interpreted with much warmth of feeling and artistic intelligence. His voice is very musical, and he sings with charming naturalness of expression."—Musical Courier.

"A line to say how very much I enjoyed your singing on Saturday. I thought it so artistic, free, and powerful."—William Shakespeare.

MR. HENRY SUNMAN

(BASS)

Licentiate of the Royal Academy of Music.

"MESSIAH."—ASHBY CHORAL SOCIETY.—"We should say that Mr. Sunman is one of, if not the best singers ever yet heard in Ashby. He always 'held' the audience, and he gave the old favourite aria 'Why do the nations' in such style as to fairly delight the audience. He was also very fine in 'The trumpet shall sound.'"—Burton Guardian, February 6, 1897.

"JUDAS MACCABÆUS."—MALVERN CHORAL SOCIETY.—"In the bass music, both recitatives and airs, Mr. Sunman sang with great feeling and artistic judgment."—Malvern News, March 26, 1897.

"CREATION."—FOLKESTONE.—"The recitative and chorus, 'In the beginning,' were given with grand effect, and I may say here that the bass solos and recitatives were most splendidly given throughout by Mr. Henry Sunman, L.R.A.M., who possesses a powerful voice of fine quality and range. It was the first time I had had the pleasure of hearing this gentleman sing, but I doubt not that, if possible, he will be prevailed upon to appear again many times in Folkestone."—Folkestone Visitor, April 7, 1897.

"ELIJAH."—PONTYPOOL HARMONIC SOCIETY.—"A performance of 'Elijah' without a good representative of the Prophet is, of course, worthless; but in securing Mr. Sunman the Society were fortunate in the extreme. Blessed with a grand voice—powerful, rich, true, and of exceptionally wide compass—he sings with rare dramatic force and admirable taste, and his rendering of the many difficult solos and recitatives last evening was a positive treat. Indeed, Mr. Sunman was an ideal Elijah, and what can we say more?"—South Wales Argus, April 30, 1897.

Please address, Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford.

THE CRICHTON PART-SINGERS

HAYDN GROVER (Alto) | HERBERT DYER (Tenor)
HUGH COCHRANE (Baritone) | FREDERICK KING (Bass)

"For well-balanced harmony, delicate phrasing, and sweetness of voice it would be hard to find their peers."—Morning Leader, December 7, 1896.

"The evening was notable for the admirable singing of a male-voice quartet, known as the 'Crichton Part-Singers,' and they were heard in Hatton's exquisite glee 'When evening's twilight,' and two compositions by Haydn Grover. They are evidently a highly disciplined body of vocalists, and our impressions are very favourable."—Bayswater Chronicle, February 13, 1897.

"The other vocalists were the 'Crichton Part-Singers,' an admirable quartet whose voices beautifully blended, and in addition to a couple of quartets and part-songs, admirably rendered, each sang at least one solo in faultless style."—Southampton Echo, January 21, 1897.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

THE QUEEN AS A MUSICIAN.

IT is generally known that the Queen is very fond of music—a fondness which was doubtless greatly stimulated by the high artistic tastes of the Prince Consort. Her Majesty's practical musicianship is pleasantly recorded in the following tributes to the Queen's executive ability as a pianist and as a singer.

Lady Bloomfield, who was a maid of honour to the Queen, relates the following incident,* under date: Windsor Castle, December 12, 1843.

"We had such a delightful practice for nearly two hours yesterday afternoon, on two pianofortes, with the Queen and Prince Albert. We played a fine, but very difficult duet of Beethoven's. The time was so difficult one requires to be a good musician to understand it."

Nearly a year later, also at Windsor, Lady Bloomfield again records one of these interesting "practices," as she modestly calls them. Writing in her diary on November 19, 1844, she says:

"We had another charming evening with the Queen and Prince last night in their private apartment, and played till eleven o'clock.

"These practices must be very improving, and it is fortunate that Matilda Paget and I read music with facility; for we generally play overtures and classical pieces at sight. Last night we played Beethoven's 'Septuor'; and the Queen observed it was quite a relief to find when we came to the last bar that we were all playing together, for had any of us gone wrong it would have been rather difficult to find one's place again! I enjoy nothing so much as seeing the Queen in that nice quiet way, and I often wish that those who don't know Her Majesty could see how kind and gracious she is when she is perfectly at her ease, and able to throw off the restraint and form which must and ought to be observed when she is in public."

Shortly after her marriage, and only two days following the attempt on her life by the wretched youth Oxford, the Queen gave a private concert at Buckingham Palace, at which Her Majesty sang no less than five times.

The actual date was June 12, 1840, and no apology is needed for giving the entire programme:

It will be observed that in addition to singing a duet with the Prince Consort, and in a trio with Rubini and Lablache (the latter of whom was the Queen's singing master), Her Majesty sang as one of the sopranos in three choruses, the last of which was probably "How lovely are the messengers," from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," doubtless translated into Italian by Costa to agree with the remainder of the programme. The part which the Queen's illustrious Consort also took will not escape notice; he was one of the basses on that interesting occasion. Miss Liddell, whose name appears amongst the vocalists, was afterwards Lady Bloomfield, from whose pleasant recollections of the Queen's music-makings we have already quoted. The Marchioness of Douro, in a letter to the late Sir Michael Costa, said: "How well Her Majesty sings, and correctly too!" But we now propose to give the opinion of even a higher authority, in regard to music, upon the Queen's vocal powers, and how admirably she used them.

Mendelssohn has given us a charming glimpse into the simple home-life of our beloved and gracious Queen in fully recording the incidents of his visit to Buckingham Palace on July 9, 1842. He was then on a six weeks' visit at the house of his wife's relations at Denmark Hill, where he wrote the well-known "Song without words" in A (No. 30). On his return to Frankfort he wrote a long letter to his mother (dated July 19, 1842), describing his second visit to the Queen, from which we make a most interesting extract.

This letter has been specially translated for the present article by Mrs. Benecke, the composer's elder daughter, to whom we tender our best thanks. Beginning his letter with "Dear little Mother," he goes on to say that Buckingham Palace is a really pleasant and thoroughly comfortable English house, where one feels à son aise, though, he adds, he does know a few others answering to the same description. He then proceeds as follows:—

"Prince Albert had invited me to try his organ on Saturday at 1.30, before he left town. I found him alone, and as we were talking the Queen came in, also alone, in a simple morning dress. She said she had to leave for Claremont in an hour, and then she exclaimed, 'but what a litter you are in!' as the wind had scattered some loose leaves of music about the room and upon the pedals of the organ, which, by the way, is a pretty ornament to the room. While saying this, she knelt down and began to pick up the leaves; Prince Albert also helped and I, too, was not idle. Then the Prince began to explain to me the stops, and the Queen said that she would finish tidying up alone. I now begged the Prince to play to me, so that I might boast in Germany of having heard him. He then played a chorale by heart with the pedals, quite correctly, and so nicely and clearly that it might have served as an example to many a professional organist. The Queen, who had finished her work, sat by his side and listened with evident pleasure to his playing. After he had finished, it was my turn, and I began with my chorus from 'St. Paul,' 'How lovely are the messengers.' Before I had gone through the first portion they both began to sing the chorus, and Prince Albert managed the stops very cleverly all the time—first adding a flute, then at the forte more stops, at the D major part the 'full organ'; then he made an excellent diminuendo—and so on to the end, all by heart, that I really was quite delighted and greatly pleased. The Hereditary Prince of Gotha having come in, some conversation began, during which the Queen told me that she liked singing my songs, and asked me if I had written any new ones. 'You should sing one to him,' said Prince Albert. She required a little persuading at first, and then said she would try the Spring Song in B flat, 'if it can be found, for all my music has been packed up for Claremont.' Prince Albert went to look for it, but came back saying that it was already packed. 'Oh, but could it not be unpacked?' I asked. 'We must send for Lady ——' (I did not catch the name) the Queen said, and rang the bell. The servants ran to and fro and returned looking quite distressed. Then the Queen herself went to see about it. While she was gone, Prince Albert gave me a small case containing a beautiful ring, on which is engraved: 'V.R., 1842,' and said: 'The Queen begs you to accept this as a memento of her.' The Queen then came back and said: 'Lady —— has gone and taken all my things with her—it is most annoying.' (You can't think how this amused me.) I now asked her not to let me suffer by this incident, but to sing something else, and after consulting with her husband, the Prince said: 'She will sing you something by Gluck.' Meanwhile the Princess of Gotha had joined us, and all five of us went through many rooms and corridors till we arrived at the Queen's sitting-room, where a huge rocking-horse was standing by the piano. Two bird-cages were also in the room, pictures on the walls, beautifully bound books on the table, and music on the piano. The Duchess of Kent came in, and while they were talking together, I looked through the music and found my first Book of Songs. Of course I begged the Queen to choose one of my songs instead of the Gluck, and she very readily did so in a most amiable way; and what did she choose but—'Italy.'* She sang it most beautifully in tune, strictly in time, and phrased it charmingly. But where it goes down to D natural, followed by D sharp, she sang both notes D sharp; and, as I gave her the D natural in the first two verses, she also sang D natural in the last, when it ought to have been D sharp! But with this exception it was really delightful, and I have not heard the last long G sung by any amateur with such ease and in such perfect tune. When it was finished I had to confess that the song was composed by Fanny! (I must say it was rather hard to have to say it, but 'pride comes before a fall.') I then asked the Queen to sing a song which was really my own composition. She said that if I would give her plenty of help she would willingly do so. She sang 'Lass dich nur nichts nicht dauern' ('The Pilgrim's Song') really quite faultlessly, and with beautiful feeling and expression. I thought it would not do to appear too complimentary at such a time, and therefore I merely thanked her over and over again; but when she said: 'Oh, if I had not been so frightened I could have done better, I generally have very long breath,' I praised her very heartily and with the best conscience in the world; for that phrase near the end, having the long-sustained C, she sang so well, joining the C to the three following notes, all in one breath, as one rarely hears it done, that it highly amused me that she herself should have spoken about it.

"After this Prince Albert sang 'Es ist ein Schnitter, der heisst Tod' ('The Reaper and the flowers'), and then he said that I was to play something before I left. He gave me as themes the chorale he had played and the song he had just sung.

"Had things gone as they often do, I should have improvised abominably and carried away nought but regret of my whole morning. But no; it seemed as if I were to have nothing but a bright and happy recollection of my visit. I succeeded better than I ever remember doing. I felt quite carried away and played a long time, and thoroughly enjoyed it myself. Naturally enough, I added to the two given themes the two songs sung by the Queen, and they all seemed to fit in so well that I did not at all like leaving off. The Queen and the other listeners followed my playing with such sympathetic and intelligent interest that I felt happier in playing to them than I have ever done when improvising in public. When I had finished the Queen said: 'I hope you will soon come to England again and see us,' and with this I took my leave.

"It was a happy morning. I have still to add that I asked the Queen's permission to dedicate to her my ('Scotch') Symphony in A minor, because, to a great extent, that had been the object of my journey, and also because her name would look specially well on the title-page of a composition suggested by Scotland. And another thing: just as she was about to sing she said, 'But the parrot must go out of the room first, or he will screech louder than I can sing.' Whereupon Prince Albert rang the bell. The Prince of Gotha said: 'I will carry him out myself,' and I put in: 'Allow me to do it,' and I carried out the big cage, to the astonishment of the servants."

* In order to explain the humour of the situation, it should be stated that in the first set of Mendelssohn's published songs (Op. 8), two of them, including "Italy," were composed by his sister, Fanny; but as she did not wish her name to be made public, the whole of the songs were attributed to Mendelssohn.

VICTORIAN MUSIC.

VI.—Opera.

Some idea of what was doing in opera at the beginning of Her Majesty's reign may fitly be given at the outset of this paper. I pass over the season of 1837, and begin my survey with that of the Coronation year.

Her Majesty's Theatre (lately the King's Theatre) opened in March with the début of Persiani, who chose the part of Amina in what a contemporary critic called the "rather hackneyed" opera of "La Sonnambula."

Costa conducted with, as usual, an enlarged orchestra. That potent chief agreed with his brother-imperator, Napoleon the Great, in believing that Providence favoured the biggest battalions. With this opening performance as a peg, the editor of the Musical World displayed a "leading article" now singularly instructive as to the condition of taste in opera sixty years ago.

It is interesting to discover that in 1838 the critics were calling each other names because of disagreement. They operated in two cliques. Clique I. assailed the then modern Italian school, as illustrated, say, by Donizetti, and referred to Mozart as a criterion. Clique II. supported the newer works, and issue was joined. Our editor threw his weight on the side of Clique II., and did not mince his speech. Referring to his opponents, he said: "The pretensions of these self-styled arbiters of the public taste are in exact ratio with their incompetence; their judicial arrogance is only exceeded by their mental destitution. Professing to penetrate into the hidden mysteries of things, they are incapable of seeing their surface; fancying themselves wise, they have not become, but only remained fools." Obviously there were musical railers before the Wagnerian era began; but this was only the editor's way of showing his disagreement with the party opposite, who, no doubt, retaliated in the same style and in a like Pickwickian sense. Coming out of the region of opinion into that of facts, the editor told his readers: "No sooner does Her Majesty's Theatre open, under more than usually favourable auspices, than the floodgates of discontent and objurgation are uplifted, and a torrent of abuse poured forth on the devoted heads of all the modern Italian opera composers, including, by name or implication, Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, Costa, and Benedict (!). Mozart is paraded as the sole depository of stage excellence, with the single object of depreciating his great successors." Our editor, thereupon, proceeds to give reasons for supporting the modern works. I need not trouble the reader with these, but must draw attention to the journalist's parting shot: "To prefer such strains (those of Bellini) to hackneyed madrigals, worn-out glees, and their thread-bare imitations; or to choral Masses, imperfectly developed, unhallowed by a spark of sacred fire, and unredeemed by the glowing warmth of the secular compositions of which they are a bastard progeny, is no evidence of the bad taste of our metropolitan amateurs, but, on the contrary, indicates a sound appreciation of what is good and beautiful in art, and a thorough ability to distinguish between what is befitting and unbecoming in its several branches." The perceptive reader will gather from this that the opposite camp contained the forces of conservatism, but it seems a little odd to us now to find the advanced school gathered under the banner of Rossini, Donizetti, and Co., at whom our own progressives sneer so consistently.

The classicists of 1838 had very little influence upon the course of events; everything—public favour, Royal patronage, and the charm of gifted singers—aided their opponents, who went from success to success. From the first, her Majesty was a warm sympathiser with Italian opera, and supported it by frequent personal attendance. She witnessed the first performance in this country of "Lucia di Lammermoor," which the critic of the Musical World dismissed with a "moderate share of approval." Other operas were "Otello," "I Puritani," "Norma"—all of the same school. "Her Majesty and her illustrious mother," adds the Musical World, "have attended the house every night since our last number, and rank and fashion grace the boxes on every occasion."

The classicists were not without their hour of triumph. "Don Giovanni" followed the works mentioned above, and "at the first rush the pit and galleries were filled, and, before the curtain drew up, hundreds of amateurs had found a refuge for the destitute behind the scenes, in every available nook." The Italian party of course held aloof, and Laporte, it is said, could only play a German opera by a subterfuge: "To propitiate the subscribers, he can only produce Mozart on an alleged benefit night, and he uses any name for his object. Last Thursday night no more benefited Tamburini than it did any of his colleagues, but the truth must be told: the subscribers will not have the German masters—the light, flimsy, modern Italian are preferred." Yet, àpropos to the third performance, which the Queen attended, the same paper states: "If we are to judge from the enthusiasm of the subscribers displayed throughout the opera, there must be a greater love for the classical in the world of fashion than has been generally attributed to the aristocratic visitors of the Italian Opera House." Perhaps the world of fashion followed the cue of the Court, especially as her Majesty took great interest in the performance, which she frequently applauded. Donizetti's now utterly forgotten "Parasina" was one of the novelties of the season, and failed: "The labour which Donizetti has left to the singers and band is quite frightful, and yet no hearer can have a reminiscence of the mass of sound, which is as unceasing as it is wearying." Next came another successful candidate for limbo—Rossini's "Matilde de Shabran." Later on the Italian singers were called upon to play "Le Nozze di Figaro," the chief artists entrusted with the characters being (what a group!) Grisi, Persiani, Albertazzi, Tamburini, and Lablache. They did not acquit themselves to the satisfaction of the Musical World, which said: "The school is not familiar to any of the singers and they have, or ought, to throw off the habitual licence of the florid flummery they are wont to indulge in. There were some noble and redeeming points in the vocalisation, but we cannot disguise the fact that great and unwarrantable liberties were taken with the text. The use of unmeaning cadenzas was frequent, and the jump from Mozart to Donizetti was sometimes as sudden as it was ludicrous."

A repetition of "Le Nozze" in Coronation week was attended by a curious scene. So great was the crush into the pit that the front ranks stormed over into the stalls, where they held their ground against the police, and could be removed only by an arrangement to admit them behind the scenes. Let the chronicler continue the story: "Such were the number of the ejected stallites and banished pittites that they occupied the entire stage, sturdily refusing to move, and insisting that the opera should be gone through in the space before the curtain. . . . A general row was anticipated, but at length a coup de théâtre was successfully resorted to. A scene was let down at the back of the stage, as though for the opera to begin, and the overture began. The stage visitors rushed to secure the best places at the rear and wings, but, presto! another scene was let down nearer the drop curtain, thus cutting off a considerable number of the invaders, and, before they could rally and recover their lost ground, the theatrical officials had formed an impenetrable phalanx at the sides, only permitting the performers to pass. . . . The opera was got through in the first act without a change of scene. It was with infinite difficulty the performers could make their entrances and exits. Very often the business was at a standstill, Grisi calling out for Lablache, not in character, or Persiani demanding Tamburini." Costa's "Malek Adel" was given on a command night, somewhat later in the season. Her Majesty attended, and, not long after, presented the composer-conductor with a pianoforte. Other works of the season included Balfe's "Falstaff"—another failure—and the long season came to an end in August.

I need not comment on the foregoing particulars. The reader sees that the Italian opera of 1838 was that of many later years, and the only fact of significance is that a not inconsiderable part of the public—outside the "world of fashion"—desired better things.

During the same year, both Drury Lane Theatre and that in Covent Garden were playing opera by way of relief to purely dramatic representations. Some works of native origin were produced, but it does not appear that the performances were graced by Royalty and its entourage, albeit the Musical World pleaded in the highest quarter on behalf of English art and artists, begging the Queen to "condescend especially to promote and foster the cultivation of native musical science, the increase of which for a series of years has doubtless contributed in no minor degree to concentrate the social tendencies and to soften the national character." Native art, nevertheless, struggled on, as it did through many a darker hour, and, from time to time, new works were produced. Among these, at Drury Lane, were Balfe's "Diadeste, or the Veiled Lady," with Miss Romer, Miss Poole, Templeton and Phillips in the cast, and "The Harvest Home," in which the singer last-named aspired to the honours of an operatic composer. He anticipated Wagner by writing both words and music himself, but not in pushing his achievement to success. "We are sorry, for Mr. Phillips' sake, that he has miscalculated his powers, but non omnis possumus omnes. The audience endured the piece with general good humour to nearly the close, when they significantly pronounced the 'Harvest Home' premature." A Mr. Lodge next tried his hand, in association with a librettist who "prudently concealed his name." Mr. Lodge bravely revealed himself, and stood a heavy fire from a whole battalion of critics. "There is a lady who prays and screams; a lover who whines and does nothing else; a brigand who murders and kidnaps—in short, wonders follow upon wonders to make up a show, but we cannot pretend to make intelligible the unintelligible. . . . Mr. Lodge has probably learned by this time that it is one thing to write a glee for the old gentlemen at the 'Thatched House' and another to write an opera for Drury Lane. . . . As the music did not afford us the least gratification, so we have no recollection of a single movement. It is certainly the least fitted for the stage of any we ever listened to, and the accompaniments were in the highest degree puerile and absurd." Reading this, the composer must have wished himself a Lodge in some vast wilderness.

Covent Garden, as well as Drury Lane, closed in July, and the English Opera House opened with a German opera, called "Rob of the Fen," "a miserable affair both musically and dramatically." In the same month the doors of St. James's Theatre were thrown back to admit the curious concerning "Il Tornio," an opera composed by Lord Burghersh, founder of the Royal Academy of Music. "Il Tornio," said the Musical World, "is strictly an Italian opera, and we defy any professor to pick out an English phrase from any movement." The English Opera House followed on with Macfarren's "Devil's Opera," àpropos to which the composer was reprimanded thus: "Mr. Macfarren has evidently been led astray by the ambition, the ridiculous ambition, of our singers to undertake that to which they have no pretensions, and has accordingly wasted time and labour on things called scenas which would have been much more profitably bestowed on the creation of simple airs and melodies. He has run, too, into a besetting sin of our composers, sacrificing the vocal to the instrumental part of the composition and involving his airs in the orchestral accompaniments."

The particulars foregoing, taken from contemporary records, give a clear idea as to the condition of the lyric stage in London sixty years ago. On the one hand, we see Italian opera supported by rank and fashion, temporarily flourishing and deserving to flourish if there be any merit in executive talent of the highest order. On the other hand, we have poor English opera given a lodging by the drama, and struggling on as best it can under conditions which almost amounted to pauperism. But alike in the Haymarket and in the region of Covent Garden the labour was artistically profitless. Of all the operas produced during 1838, how many exist save as the memory of a name? Apples of Sodom, Dead Sea fruit, all of them; and as this survey begins with disappointment, with disappointment must it continue. In no branch of art have we so little progressed during sixty years as in lyric drama. Joseph Bennett.

FROM MY STUDY.

Music and The Queen's Marriage.

It seems fitting, as a correspondent suggests, that I should follow up the notes on music at her Majesty's coronation which appeared last month with others having reference to the happy event of the Royal marriage. The second great ceremonial of personal interest in the Queen's reign was one peculiarly adapted to excite the fervid loyalty of a nation which had not forgotten the delirium that attended the accession of the Maiden Sovereign. Hardly less was it calculated to set the pens of poets and musical composers in motion, to the double end of patriotism and profit. Following the engagement of the Queen and Prince Albert, no time was lost in the preparation of works which the French so exactly describe as pièces d'occasion. Jefferys and Co., for example, promptly put forth advertisements headed: "Her Majesty and Prince Albert." "We," said the firm, giving style, title, and address, "have just published the following pieces of music, adorned by splendid and correct portraits of the illustrious personages to whom they are dedicated." The list included "Rose d'Amour," quadrilles by C. W. Glover; "Rose d'Amour," waltzes by J. Wilcox; "Prince Albert's Band March," by Stephen Glover; and an effusion entitled "I caught her tear at parting," otherwise "Prince Albert's Parting Song," music by Ernest Kollman. These were ready, and there was a promise of two others: "The Queen's Bridal Song" and "The Queen's Bridal March." Messrs. Jefferys and Co. issued a much fuller announcement as the wedding day approached. Under the heading "Her Majesty's Marriage," they said: "The following Songs and Pieces, composed in honour of the Nuptials of Her most gracious Majesty and H.R.H. the Prince Albert, with authentic Portraits of the Royal Bride and Bridegroom, correct delineations of the Ceremonies, and Portraits of the Royal and Noble Personages present on the occasion, are published only by," &c. In the second list appear, "The Queen's Country Dances," in three sets, arranged by R. Guinness, and a companion song to "I caught her tear at parting," entitled "The Meeting, or Prince Albert's return to England." Special attention is called to "The Queen's Bridal Song" by the authoress of "We've lived and loved together." "This song," say the publishers, "will be found pre-eminently beautiful. The poetry and music are characterised by that excellence which"—and so on. No doubt that as did Messrs. Jefferys so did other firms; but it is scarcely worth while to look for further proof that our art wore wedding favours on the auspicious occasion.

No special interest appears to have been taken in the music prepared for the marriage service. I can find but one anticipatory paragraph in the leading musical journal of the day, and that does not suggest enthusiasm:

"The music at the Queen's marriage, which will take place at the Chapel Royal, St. James's, on Monday next, at twelve o'clock at noon, will be under the direction of Sir George Smart, the senior organist, who will preside at the instrument, to which several alterations have been made by Gray, under Sir George's direction. These consist of a variety of mechanical contrivances by which he will be enabled to play in a temporary gallery erected in front of the organ. The performers will merely consist of the gentlemen and choirboys of the Chapel Royal." The temporary gallery here spoken of was really for the choir, and Gray added a "long action," so that the organist could have a position in front of the singers.

In the issue of the Musical World next following the wedding, the editor said: "We cannot let the occasion pass without evincing our loyalty by chronicling so great an event, and expressing a heartfelt wish that it may be productive of happiness to both, and that peace and prosperity may attend the British throne." The chronicle continues:

"The musical department was under the direction of Sir George Smart. . . The vocalists consisted of the gentlemen and choirboys of the Chapel Royal. On the entrance of His Royal Highness Prince Albert, Sir George Smart played a voluntary, and also when Her Majesty appeared. After the prayer, 'God the Father,' the choir performed the Deus miseratur, King's in B flat, the verse parts being doubled and sung by Messrs. Knyvett, Wilde, Neild, Vaughan, Sale, and Bradbury, on the decani side, and, on the cantoris, by Messrs. Evans, Salmon, Horncastle, Roberts, Welsh, and Clark. Kent's anthem, 'Blessed be the Lord God,' concluded the service."

With these meagre details readers of the Musical World had to be content. But, truly, the selection of music did not invite a minute account, though possibly it called for a question as to the preference repeatedly shown on State occasions to the works of worthy Mr. Kent, of Winchester. That composer was certainly popular, and "Kent's Blessed" held first place in the esteem of village choirs all the land over; but this could hardly have recommended the anthem to the authorities at St. James's.

A Coronation Muddle.

My story of bad management in the musical section of the Coronation ceremony (see The Musical Times for May) should here be supplemented by some details which go to prove that there was a general muddle. I take the following from the Greville Memoirs:—

"The different actors in the ceremonial were very imperfect in their parts, and had neglected to rehearse them. Lord John Thynne, who officiated for the Dean of Westminster, told me that nobody knew what was to be done except the Archbishop and himself (who had rehearsed), Lord Willoughby (who is experienced in these matters), and the Duke of Wellington, and consequently there was a continual difficulty and embarrassment, and the Queen never knew what she was to do next. They made her leave her chair and enter into St. Edward's Chapel before the prayers were concluded, much to the discomfiture of the Archbishop. She said to John Thynne, 'Pray tell me what I am to do, for they don't know'; and at the end, when the orb was put into her hand, she said to him, 'What am I to do with it?' 'Your Majesty is to carry it, if you please, in your hand.' 'Am I?' she said, 'it is very heavy.' The ruby ring was made for her little finger instead of the fourth, on which the rubric prescribes that it should be put. When the Archbishop was to put it on, she extended the former, but he said it must be on the latter. She said it was too small, and she could not get it on. He said it was right to put it there, and, as he insisted, she yielded, but had first to take off her other rings, and then this was forced on, but it hurt her very much, and as soon as the ceremony was over she was obliged to bathe her finger in iced water in order to get it off."

With such carelessness and blundering as this on the very steps of the throne it is no wonder that things were at sixes and sevens in the choir gallery. The general incompetence is the less to be excused because there had been two coronations within the eighteen years immediately preceding, and the performers could not plead inexperience.

Royal Marriage Lays.

The weather behaved itself admirably on the day of the Queen's Coronation, but her wedding day was sadly unpropitious. It rained in torrents and blew "great guns"—a dismal condition of things described by both pen and pencil in Cruikshank's Comic Almanack for 1841. The inimitable George has a little etching, entitled "A Marry-time View," showing a dripping crowd tramping along in the mud, some with umbrellas turned inside out by a blast which has hurled a chimneypot on their heads. Below are verses in the punning style of Pierce Egan, a specimen of which will suffice:

A gathering of the people, all from home,
The reigning Queen and raining sky to view;
In Italy the million rush to Rome,
Are they not free to roam in London too?

Throngs of the curious, curiously met,
An inconsistent batch of low and high;
Drunkards, for instance, getting drenched with wet,
And still declaring they were very dry.

Women with pattens found to clog the way,
Young thieves aspiring to the golden fleece,
'Mid torrents fair, that soaked, with equal play,
A new policeman or a new pelisse.

And so on, labouringly. Such an impression did the bad weather make that a song-writer of the day took upon him to bid the Queen cheer up. Thus he sang:

Droop not, fair Queen, though clouds
O'ercast thy nuptial day,
Though, hid in sullen clouds,
The day-god turns away.
Canst thou not see
'Tis jealousy
Of Coburg's happy doom
Provokes his wrath,
Darkens his path,
And wisps (wraps ?) him round in gloom.

Haste to thy bridal bower,
Young, innocent and fair,
Thy own pure heart hath power
To make all sunshine there.
Where'er you move
Truth, grace and love
Thy handmaidens will be;
Let Phœbus smile,
Or frown the while,
It matters nought to thee.

The song from which these stanzas are taken is one of a very large collection contained in "The London Singer's Magazine." The issue was in weekly numbers at a penny; each number containing a wood-cut by the Cruikshanks or some other comic limner, and the model followed being "The Universal Songster," which preceded the "Magazine" by a few years. A complete copy is now very rare; the original purchasers, it may be supposed, not troubling to bind the numbers. One such, however, is in my possession. It has no date, but supplies an abundance of internal proof that publication took place during the earliest years of the Queen's reign. Though some of the songs were suggested by the Coronation, the people's poets were more largely inspired by the marriage, which they variously hailed, now seriously, anon in jocular mood.

The serious marriage songs are, taking them generally, by no means unworthy things of their kind. Here is a stanza from "Old England's Royal Bride":

Proud daughter of a kingly race,
Young Empress of the Isles,
That morn shall view thy lovely face
All radiant with smiles;
And thou shalt at the altar stand,
The lov'd one by thy side,
For he has won thy heart and hand,
Old England's Royal Bride.

"Victoria's Wedding Day" was "written expressly for the occasion by J. H. Brown," and thus it runs:

Let the merry bells be ringing,
Let the jocund music play;
Let the nation's voice be singing,
'Tis Victoria's wedding day.
Weave a crown of flow'rets blooming,
Shamrock, thistle, rose combine;
In their freshness unconsuming,
Round her Royal brow entwine.

Bless the vow that none can sunder,
Bless the nuptials of the Queen;
Jove, withhold thy bolts of thunder,
Let no sorrow now be seen.

This poet was obviously a slave to rhyme, and he should have blessed the bond that none can sunder, not the "vow"; but he meant well.

The Royal marriage was celebrated in Drury Lane Theatre by an "Emblematical Tribute," whatever that may have been. Some of its songs are in the collection, including an additional verse for the National Anthem:

Joy to our lovely Queen!
Noble of heart and mien,
Virtuous as fair!
Joy to the manly breast,
Where her true love shall rest,
Happy, content and blest,
Hail, matchless pair!

The poet, whose name is not given, rose higher in "O joyful Spring!"—sung by Mr. Frazer and chorus:

O joyful Spring, upon the wedded pair
Sprinkle thy balmy showers—
Sweet Summer, smile away each frown of care,
And strew their path with flowers.

Autumn, thy harvest and thy fruits bestow,
Till all thy wealth be spent;
And thou, O Winter, with thy spotless snow
Make their old age content.

Then another measure:

Come, ye manly, come, ye fair,
Weave a wreath of evergreen—
Token for the wedded pair,
Tribute to Britannia's Queen.

Sprigs of ivy hither bring,
Oaken boughs of sturdy form;
Ivy that for aye doth cling,
Oak that doth defy the storm.

Twined together let them be—Faithful emblems may they prove;
He the oak, the ivy she;
He to foster, she to love.

Would that all occasional verse were as good as this. X.

We have received the following letter from Sir George Grove on the subject of "Tampering with the Classics," which, as an expression of opinion from so eminent an authority on Beethoven in this country, will be read with interest:—

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I have read Mr. Jaeger's genial letter in your last number—"Tampering with the Classics," page 339. The question is a very serious one. Your correspondent is no doubt right on his own ground, but I venture to think that his ground is wrong.

The words, notes, or colours of a poet, composer, or painter—unless in the case of obvious unintentional oversights—must be left as he left them when he quitted the world and his control was taken off them. As Chopin said (Niecks's Life, II., 126) when Liszt played a piece of his with original embellishments: "I beg of you, my dear friend, if you do me the honour to play a piece of mine, to play what is written, or to play something else. It is only Chopin who has the right to alter Chopin." Depend upon it, he was right. In the excellent words* of Mr. Franklin Taylor, "Why should a composer of music be less respectfully treated than the author of a literary composition?"

It has taken us nearly three centuries to learn this in the case of Shakespeare; and after such an experience we ought to apply the rule to Beethoven without hesitation. We have got to take the best that that great man could give while he was alive, not something for which a second person is wanted; for that, let that second person himself write independently. Indeed, the world has already come a certain distance towards this opinion in music. Whatever we may have felt fifty years ago, we are not now comfortable under Mozart's alterations of Handel—in fact, such alterations introduce a restless feeling as to whose, after all, the music is.

To take an extreme case—What can be said about such an achievement as Mr. John Barnett's clever completion of Schubert's Symphony in E? Whose is it when it is done? Schubert's or Barnett's? and so in all cases.

But even if my axiom were not self-evident, there is, I submit, another consideration in the present case. It is notorious that Beethoven was not satisfied with making an approximate approach to representing the idea which he had in his mind. He came as absolutely near it as he could, after all possible efforts. He wrote and re-wrote, until he expressed as exactly as possible what he wanted. It is thus not a "miscalculated effect" which we possess in his score, it is Beethoven's own intended effect. Now all the instances in which Wagner or others have corrected or improved Beethoven have been based on the supposition that he might have done better if he had known how to do so—in other words, had had the modern orchestra at his disposal. To use again Mr. Taylor's words (p. 46): "Of all composers Beethoven was perhaps the most scrupulously attentive to detail, not only in his marking of all the nuances, but especially with regard to the values of his notes, and on this account conscientious teachers and players have always objected to the smallest deviation from the text, as a wrong done to the intentions of the composer."

I am not going to insist upon the passage in the first movement of the "Eroica," where the horn comes in with the chord of E flat while the fiddles have the accompaniment of the notes B flat and A flat, even though Wagner and Costa, and the editor of the London edition of a "Complete collection of Mozart's and Beethoven's Symphonies in score," about 1810, did alter the second violin to G, and others have done as absurd things. I say nothing about this, because no one now disputes that the original notes are right, however they may sound. But take the case where the first subject of the first movement of No. 8 Symphony comes back after the working-out, where the subject is heard in the violoncellos and basses only, and the whole of the rest of the score is occupied with lengthened notes, the whole fff. People say that the violoncellos and basses are lost. Is it sure that Beethoven wanted them to sound more clearly than they do? What he seems to have wanted is an enormous noise as a climax to the più f two bars before, with a mere flavour of the tune. If he had wished more than a mere flavour it would have been perfectly easy for him, with the materials at his hand, to take the trumpets and bassoons, for instance, and add them to the lowest strings. He must have left this passage entirely with his eyes open, and therefore the complaints which are sometimes made against it are complaints against him, and not against his orchestra. In the instance given from the Scherzo of the Ninth Symphony, it would have been surely easy and obvious for Beethoven to give the characteristic vigour of the Scherzo, which he confines to the string quartet, to the trumpets and drums as well, of which he makes no use at all.

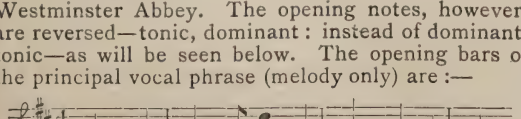
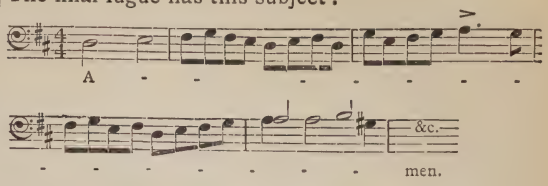
Looking at the thing without prejudice we cannot help feeling that this is so, and also we cannot but feel that if instruments belonging to the modern orchestra —i.e., valved instruments—are introduced, a different quality will be given to the sound, which would be as much out of keeping with Beethoven's brass as Mozart's clarinets are with Handel's band.



I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
G. GROVE.

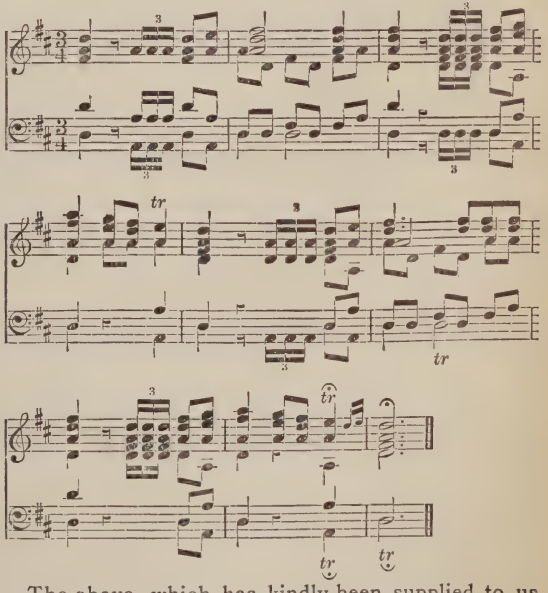
Lower Sydenham,
May 11, 1897.



"GOD save the Queen" will be much in evidence during the third week of the present month. Everyone knows that the tune is in triple time; but there are instances of its having been changed to a quadruple rhythm with more or less success. In the former category may be placed its use by Gounod in the first of the two marches he wrote for the marriage of the late Duke of Albany, in which the melody of the National Anthem is ingeniously introduced in long notes as an inner part. Not so successful was Czerny, of Study fame, who, in 1838, wrote "Queen Victoria's Coronation March," a copy of which now lies before us. The march is in D, but the second trio, in G, makes its appearance in the following form, of which we give the melody only, and an octave lower than written—

THE harmonies which Professor Bridge has used in the second verse of the new version of "God save the Queen" are taken from Attwood's anthem "I was glad," written for the coronation of George IV., and also sung at that of Queen Victoria. The anthem, "O Lord, grant the King a long life," which Attwood composed for the coronation of William IV., has not, so far as we know, been reprinted; it is, therefore, less familiar than "I was glad." As a compliment to the sailor king, Attwood introduced the melody of "Rule, Britannia," into the instrumental introduction (Allegro maestoso, thirty-five bars long) of "O Lord, grant the King." This movement is first played without the nautical theme, and then repeated, piano, with the addition of "Rule, Britannia," given out by the trumpet and horn, forte, which must have had a strange effect when heard within the walls of Westminster Abbey. The opening notes, however, are reversed—tonic, dominant: instead of dominant, tonic—as will be seen below. The opening bars of the principal vocal phrase (melody only) are :—

The final fugue has this subject :—



After the exposition, four bars of Dr. Arne's national air are used as a counter-subject in the soprano—and later on "dear old Mr. Attwood" combines these two subjects with the principal vocal theme of the anthem (alto), plus a free part (tenor), "in a manner no less skilful than pleasing"—

A CORRESPONDENT asks us: "What notes or phrases were played by the state trumpeters when Queen Victoria was proclaimed in 1838?" In reply, we have pleasure in stating that the "Flourish" performed at the coronation of King William the Fourth was as follows, scored for four trumpets, bass trombone, and kettle-drums :—

The above, which has kindly been supplied to us by Mr. Walter Morrow, the well-known trumpet-player, was probably composed by Thomas Harper (the elder), who was state trumpeter on that occasion. As he still held that office at the time of the coronation of Queen Victoria, it may reasonably be assumed that the same "Flourish" was used at the Proclamation of the Queen in 1838.

Musical educationists inclined to doubt the value of choral competitions as a means of stimulating choirs and discussing musical skill may be confidently recommended to cogitate over the accounts we give elsewhere of the recent events at Kendal, Leeds, Carlisle, Morecambe, and Madresfield. Leeds and the district have achieved world-wide fame by the singing of the Festival choir. But this famous choir is of course a result. It could not have existed but for the experience gained by choralists in the numerous small choirs that are found in connection with places of worship and other centres. Most of these choirs consist of not more than about thirty members. But they often have voice enough for a hundred ordinary choralists, and their standards of execution of unaccompanied choral classics, being born of frequent contact with one another at local competitions, is surprisingly high. At the competition organised by the Leeds Prize Musical Union at the Town Hall, on the 1st ult., there were fourteen male-voice choirs and eight mixed voice choirs. They sang separately with gratifying excellence, but no one present on the occasion could fail to be deeply impressed with the sublime effect of the whole number singing in chorus. The audience was made up of keenly interested choralists. When, during an interval in the proceedings, "Lead, kindly Light," was called for, the effect of the audience and the united choirs, which together thronged the large hall, uniting in unaccompanied four-part harmony sent a thrill of ecstasy through many present, and induced a wonder whether anything more impressive could exist than the simple beauty of the human voice divine. It was the ne plus ultra of congregational singing.

It is right to record that all the competitions mentioned above, except Leeds, are the direct outcome of the splendid example of Kendal, where, as everyone knows, Miss Wakefield is an inspiring force. The specialty of nearly all these gatherings is the awakening of local forces. The prizes are small, and are not open to distant prize-hunters who have no real interest in the district itself. In the course of working these local competitions, numerous apparently small but really vital questions have to be settled. The experience of a decade at Kendal has made Miss Wakefield an adept in the art of this peculiar organisation. No greater compliment could be paid to that lady than the reproductions of the Kendal scheme that are springing up in various parts of the country. May they increase and multiply!

One of the musical critics of the Standard draws attention to a practice on the increase in our concert-rooms which is discouraging to our composers. Commenting on the appearance of a young English singer, the critic says: "The selection of songs by Cornelius, Vivaldi, Salvator Rosa, Schubert, Massenet, Grieg, and Brahms showed also cultivated and refined taste, which, however, made the omission of English composers specially remarkable. Miss —— is not by any means singular in this ignorance or slighting of the lyrics of British writers. It is comparatively seldom that the high-class songs of our living musicians are heard in the concert-room. Yet Mackenzie, Parry, Stanford, Cowen, and many others have written lyrics which are worthy to be set side by side with the finest productions of Continental composers. It should be the mission of all cultured English singers, especially the younger, to make known the highest endeavours of their countrymen." The above needs no comment, but there is another matter which rising vocalists would do well to consider. Is it not somewhat absurd that an English singer wishing to favourably impress an English audience should address that audience in all civilised languages but their own? Moreover, how many vocalists can properly pronounce, we do not say speak, the various languages which they essay? By all means let the masterpieces of foreign writers be rendered in their respective tongues, but this does not necessitate the banishment of English songs, or their being placed in apologetic fashion at the end of the programme. There is more merit in pronouncing English well than in singing in broken French or German, and many young vocalists who are only mediocre in the Continental schools can sing their native ditties with charm and distinction.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

The musical critic of the Bailliage, a paper published in Guernsey, has by no means satisfied a correspondent of the Guernsey Star, àpropos to a certain performance of "Elijah" in the island. From a letter addressed to the Star, I gather that at the concert in question some of the arrangements were unusual, nevertheless the critic went in for praise to an extent which the correspondent describes as "truly unique in effrontery and insular conceit." This, after all, is only a case of one gentleman disagreeing with another, and I should not notice it here but for a sentence in the Star: "If Mr. Joseph Bennett, who so often immortalises the choice sayings of the 'office-boy,' ever discovers Guernsey, The Musical Times will need enlargement." I should like to say in this connection that I am no horse fly on the look-out for sores simply as such, and that when, from time to time, I point out errors and absurdities in criticism, my object is to shame newspaper editors and proprietors into the decency of entrusting it to men who know something about the art and can convey their knowledge to the reader. In too many cases the general reporter goes to concerts, as he goes to coroners' inquests. No doubt, he does his best, poor man, but what business has he in such a galley?

The organ has often moved a reporter to eloquence, and a striking example recently appeared in a Surrey newspaper: "Anon it (the organ) was loud and majestic, smiting a ponderous melody through the shrouds of a mighty ship; again it was low and sweet as the sighing of summer winds, while in the noble phrasing of the last selection, which was listened to by the congregation upstanding, it was amply demonstrated that the good people of St. John's have reason to be proud of this new acquisition to their church." It does not quite readily appear how such a demonstration could be made by noble phrasing, but that does not affect the eloquence of the passage.

It is satisfactory to find, as I do from a forwarded "cutting," that Chichester boasts an amateur orchestral society (conductor, Mr. A. G. Whitehead), and that the society has, in the words of the local Observer, "come to stay." The programme of a concert recently given shows that the members are bent upon learning to walk before they attempt to run, a proof of wisdom somewhat rare in these days. The Observer, however, tells them that they ought to "stick to better work than playing waltzes." That may be, but if, as the same paper says, two symphonic movements by Haydn "proved somewhat exacting," a waltz must be about the measure of the orchestra's powers, especially as the only wind instruments available are a flute, oboe, and clarinet. No sensible man despises the day of small things. In a grain of mustard seed there is a potential tree, as a high authority has taught us.

Another piece of news from Chichester is less satisfactory, and the Observer tells its readers so in a "double-leaded" first leader. It appears from the editorial statement that many of the congregation who attend the Cathedral on Sunday afternoon leave after the anthem, and before the sermon. That conduct is not peculiar to Chichester, and is scarcely surprising anywhere, seeing how often Cathedral sermons are stale, flat, and unprofitable. But the clergy object; naturally enough, from their point of view. The Dean wishes to have hearers, even when he holds forth for fifty minutes, as on a recent Sunday, and the result is a decree that "the canticles and anthems—especially on Sunday afternoons—are to be of the shortest and simplest forms." In face of this amiable measure the Cicestrians are indignant. Says the Observer: "The Very Rev. the Dean, who is felt to be the prime mover in this innovation, which is stirring up a general storm of disapprobation, is believed to have the wish to make the service more of a congregational character. But here we join issue with him. Ninety-nine out of every hundred who attend the services at the Cathedral avowedly go there reverently to listen to, and enjoy, beautiful music, so sweetly rendered by the highly-trained and accomplished choir. They have their own parish churches to which they habitually go for ordinary divine worship." The distinction here made touches the very root of the matter, but the clergy are not likely to give way on a point of management. The constitution of the Church of England makes them "lords over God's heritage," and the heritage must be content with chants and hymns if it be so ordained. Happily, Deans and Chapters cannot compel attendance, and I shall be curious to know how the new régime affects the numerical strength of the congregation on Sunday afternoons.

Someone has been good enough to send me a newspaper report of a "grand Bohemian concert" given in a town not many miles to the North of London; at the same time underlining certain passages worthy a place in a cabinet of gems. I read: "Miss —— infused a tremendous amount of energy into 'Sabbath evening Chimes,' the instrument so vibrating as to destroy the beauty of the piece." This simply means that the performer used the loud pedal unduly. Again: "Madame —— sang 'Ora pro nobis.' This was the most effective number of the evening. Sung with pathos, and accompanied by Mr. —— on the 'cello, the tremolo strains, set in a minor key, harmonised nicely with the modulations of the voice and the soft tones from the piano. Madame —— so held the attention of the audience that no sound but her voice and the cadences of the instruments could be heard, though the loud applause at the termination told how it had been enjoyed." The Bohemianism of this concert must, I suppose, be looked for in the comic part of the programme. Truly was it a dainty dish to set before the townsfolk—a plat compounded of "They're coming on again," "The Penny Whistler," "How I tickle 'em," "I've lost my pal," and "How I got married this morning," with its query, "What's the good of your honeymoon if you leave your wife behind?" Are the people to be refined and elevated by such means?

There is no limit to the executive powers of the present day. I read that a violinist, when playing a solo, "showed his skill in the Terpsichorean art," and that a tenor rendered a part-song!

Mr. Saint-Saëns finds reasons for not producing the works of Handel and Bach in Paris, and adds:

It is done in England, but how? They have good soloists, singers of great talent, who sing altogether in oratorio. Conductors and executants interpret as each sees fit, according to their own particular fancy. Such performances would be considered lamentable in Paris. Happily, the English public is long suffering; it is not troubled with ennui, or, perhaps, it accepts ennui as an inevitable necessity. Here, we would not dare to keep the public listening to fugues and interminable airs for four or five hours in succession. Such works must be cut, pruned, even mutilated, to make them acceptable.

What does this prove but "so much the worse for Paris"? Mr. Saint-Saëns, however, is a little out in his facts. We in England do not sit "listening to fugues and interminable airs for four or five hours in succession," though, in the case of good music, it would be no reproach to us if we did. But we do cut, prune, even mutilate to make certain works acceptable—which may be a reproach or may not. The point is that Mr. Saint-Saëns discourses on England without exact knowledge.

The Chicago Times-Herald publishes an "interview" with Mr. Clarence Eddy, the American organist, whose playing is well known in this country. To the question how European instruments compared with those in the States, Mr. Eddy replied:

They are better in some respects, but inferior in others. Their chief excellence is in the voicing, an art carried to a high degree of perfection in Germany and France, but in nearly all the mechanical appliances by which the organ is controlled I think the advantage is with the American instruments. They are more conservative over there than we are in the matter of adopting new devices, but their work is always substantial and admirable, and many of the great organs in Europe are distinguished by such remarkable purity and dignity of tone that it is a pleasure to play them.

It is curious that Mr. Eddy had little to say of organs and organists in this country. He referred to his own experiences here as "agreeable"; mentioned Mr. Best and Dr. Peace, and got back to the Continent again.

Here is a paragraph of some interest:

Not long ago I enjoyed the unique sensation of playing the only organ in Arizona. The occasion was looked upon as a great musical event. Special trains were run from various points, and I was told that two enthusiasts took a stage ride of ninety miles and then a journey on the railroad of 137 miles to hear the recitals.

They evidently were not Chicago people.

Well, hardly. How many people do you suppose would come even from the West side to hear a recital upon that magnificent organ in the Chicago Auditorium?

The interviewer "gave it up."

A Viennese story of Van Dyk, the tenor, reaches me by way of America. "He was witness in a case before the law courts. 'Do you spell your name with a "ck" or only a "k"?' asked the examiner. 'With a "k" only,' answered the tenor; 'you can hear the "c" to-night at the opera.'"

Says the New York Musical Age: "The American public . . . need a rest from opera now and then." They should come to London and rest for forty weeks every year.

The Chicago Orchestra (Theodore Thomas's) was run during the past season at a loss of 8,000 dollars, and has never yet made a profit in the city. If fellowship in suffering be any comfort, this should make the condition of Glasgow more tolerable.

Heigho, my masters! Read this (from the Musical Courier):

To my mind the very worst feature of all musical movement to-day is musical criticism, and the manner of it. It is paralyzing to the artist; puts the audience at sea and reduces individual opinion to indifference, laziness, incapacity. It is misleading, unmusical, for the most part dishonest, prejudiced, and chiefly good for nothing whatever as an educational basis.

We critics may still claim the benefit of a doubt. What is the judgment of "my mind" worth?

Mr. Weingartner, having broken with Bayreuth, turns his guns on Cosima Wagner, asserting that, "to perfect the art-work of Wagner, there must be a man." Here is another injustice to the sex!

Giving examples in support of an assertion that the national disease of the United States is hysteria, a writer in the Musical Courier observes:

The moral strength of the community asserts itself in grotesque ways, to be sure, but artistic appreciation has gone to far madder lengths of absurdity. The sort of vertiginous notoriety given to long-haired pianists and obese violinists is a case in point. It is not a question of whether Paderewski can play or how he plays the piano. It is not a question of how Ysaye fiddles. In those mad 'farewell" performances, when the artists were pelted with flowers, when young girls squealed like jennets, and unwholesome men and stout women sobbed with excitement, there was no room for critical enjoyment or artistic appreciation. Everything was swept away in the flood-tide of hysteria. Those scenes were neither music's triumph nor reproach. They were entirely outside the realm of artistic discussion. They were as wholly pathological as the dancing mania that overspread mediæval Europe.

Let us not suppose that we English are exempt from the disease. There are "crazes" amongst us which it only can account for.

CHURCH NEWS.

Though the seasons pass away to return again, they have features of permanent and abiding interest, or, to speak more truly, the Church's seasons are intended to bring home to us the great facts which should never be absent from our thoughts. So the music of the ecclesiastical year is of an unchanging value, and more especially so now, when the church oratorio has become an institution whereby the Creation and Redemption and the contemplation of life, mortal and immortal, are subjects which may to our advantage be constantly placed before us.

Gratifying earnestness characterised the rendering on Good Friday, at St. John's Church, Troy, U.S.A., of Sir John Stainer's fine work "St. Mary Magdalen." The enthusiastic organist, Mr. W. H. Purdy, had most carefully trained his choir; both soloists and chorus sang with impressive effect, and the presence of an immense congregation of earnest listeners completed a representation of the church oratorio as a high and solemn function. In the same town Stainer's "Crucifixion" was admirably sung at St. Paul's Church.

In connection with this subject it is of interest to remark that Gounod's "Lo! the children of the Hebrews," sung at St. Paul's Cathedral in Passiontide, is in MS. This work was in the possession of the late Sir Joseph Barnby years ago, during his organist days at St. Andrew's, Wells Street, and was first sung there on a St. Andrew's Day Festival. The score is now in the library of St. Anne's, Soho. Mr. Hoyte, of All Saints' Church, Margaret Street, possesses, it is said, a copy of this work received by that well-known organist from Sir Joseph Barnby. The double choruses and double quartet will probably restrict the use of this work, and make it one of the treasures reserved for well organised professional choirs with equally balanced parts. The appearance of an introductory march and, in a somewhat altered form, the double quartet from this church work in the same composer's "Romeo and Juliet" illustrates the aptitude of composers to quote, not always with due respect for propriety, from the works of themselves and others. But, as someone observes, great nations and great authors do not steal, they annex. Schütz's Passion Music was first introduced here by the late Sir Joseph Barnby at the concerts of the London Musical Society. The English version of this work was adapted by the energetic and painstaking successor of Sir Joseph Barnby at St. Andrew's, Wells Street, Mr. F. A. W. Docker.

Concerning Easter music, a brief observation may be made to the effect that Gounod's "Messe de Pâques" seems to be gaining favour with choirs and congregations; further, it may be noted, this work was first sung at St. Andrew's, Wells Street, to an English adaptation by Mr. Docker, some ten years ago. This service was first sung at St. Paul's Cathedral last Christmas; and has been heard at All Saints', Margaret Street, St. Agnes', Kennington, and in other churches.

The Diamond Jubilee church music is both good and plentiful. The chief pièce d'occasion, of course, is Dr. Martin's stately Te Deum laudamus, a work which, in its admirable musicianship and fine touches of dignity and feeling, illustrates the truth of the axiom, that the art producer of power and eloquence is a man with a clear head and a good heart. It needs no power of prophecy to know how this music will tell on a certain memorable day in front of the great Cathedral.

The additional military band score of this Te Deum is a matter of interest in connection with the rapidly increasing use of wind instruments other than the organ in church music. Such use is very ancient and has the authoritative recognition of the Bible narrative. At the time when stringed instruments played by the bow arrived at a practical perfection, wind instruments were less used in churches, and the organ with "strings" became, with the occasional addition of oboes and bassoons, trumpets, horns, and drums, the orchestra of the Church, as may be seen in the scores of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Still, the old kinds of cornets and trombones, the modern types of the "cornets and sackbuts" of the Scriptures, were still not altogether overlooked, and were to be heard at times in some of our cathedrals at a period not far from the beginning of the eighteenth century. The dignified, powerful, clear leadership of certain wind instruments has ever remained a power in ecclesiastical music. Our modern experience has again shown the value of such instruments in church oratorios, not only in cathedrals and other large churches, but also in churches of comparatively small area. Among other thoughts in this direction, it may be pointed out that in the case of a combination of "strings" and the organ of to-day with heavier wind pressures and pipes of larger scale than in vogue formerly, a considerable number of instruments are required—in fact, quite an orchestral proportion, in order to produce an adequate tone balance. But when this balance is secured the electric vitality of the strings makes the sound of the organ stops imitating the orchestral wind instruments quite cold and ghastly; a failure which artistically compels the introduction of orchestral wind with the strings in combination with the organ. On the other hand, the orchestral wind instruments give new life and character to organ tone, and furnish that particular special force which is the last sign of completion; and it is often better to vivify and enrich organ tone than to place both orchestra and organ in juxtaposition, so as to compel the listener to both feel and make comparisons somewhat unfavourable to both sides. As want of choir or central space is so common in churches, an effective plan is to make a small quartet selection of "reed" and a similar selection of "brass" instruments, with organ. A marked effect has been secured in some of our cathedrals and other churches by the employment, with organ, of two trumpets, or it may be two cornet-à-pistons, and three trombones with kettle-drums. "The superfluous," said an observant Frenchman, "is always the one thing wanted"; and it happens in music that the heightening effect of the crowning force of the orchestra with the organ produces a result, when judiciously used, which is both impressive and imposing. Again, this instrumental force can be accommodated in a small space, and is not only of easy control, but of immense assistance to the organist, and gives accent and warmth of tone to the choral force.

An effective Te Deum by Dr. C. Warwick Jordan is a notable instance of this last-named method of church orchestration, and this work has found marked acceptance upon several recent occasions. The setting of the great church hymn for the Accession Service at St. Margaret's, Westminster, on Sunday, the 20th inst., by the talented organist, Mr. E. H. Lemare, is instrumented upon the same lines. Wingham's fine Te Deum will be sung at the Oratory, Brompton, on the 20th inst., with brass and organ accompaniments. It will again be well remembered that the special music composed by Dr. J. F. Bridge for the Jubilee Service at Westminster Abbey ten years ago was scored in the same way, and Dr. Bridge has now arranged the National Anthem in similar fashion. There are many services to be held during the great week of this notable year in which the employment of wind instruments with organ as well as orchestral use will brighten the choral expression of the joys and loyal, happy contentment of the people of the British Empire.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. have just issued "The order for Morning and Evening Prayer, as revised for use on Sunday, June 20, 1897." This compact service-book is admirably edited by the Rev. Canon F. A. J. Hervey, and is complete in every detail. The convenience of such a publication is obvious, and should be eagerly taken advantage of for Jubilee Sunday.

ORGAN NEWS.

It would be impossible to deal with this subject without reference, however brief, to the great work done by the late W. T. Best. He commenced his unique career at a time when a leader in the art of recital-playing had an opportunity never to come again; he was the man of the opportunity. His courage in completely accepting the then new CC compass was equalled in effect by his diligence as a student. His life from the artistic point of view was an isolation which the present writer, a friend of thirty years' standing, can only regret without offering any attempted explanation. Best did once say, if anything would draw him from this feeling of, in truth, nervous egoism, it would be a partly formed resolution to take interest in the affairs of the Royal College of Organists. He was, indeed, an institution himself, and, as such, will always be remembered. His compositions for the instrument he was so complete a master of will in some instances survive, at any rate, for some time. The memory of his magnificent playing will always remain as a landmark in the musical history of a period famous for the cultivation of high-class performances of the best classical music. His admirers existed all over the world, and thousands of young organists will feel the loss of his leadership and power.

On the 18th ult. the Bishop of Rochester dedicated the new organ at St. Saviour's Collegiate Church. The instrument is the gift of Mrs. Courage, at a cost of £4,000, in memory of her late husband, Mr. Robert Courage, formerly of the neighbouring parish of Horsleydown. The organ is the work of the well-known firm of Messrs. Lewis and Co., and the design for the case was made by Sir Arthur Blomfield. The dedication music included a Te Deum by Dr. Warwick Jordan, and the organist, Dr. A. Madeley Richardson, displayed the organ in the following well-chosen solos: Sonata in E flat, Rheinberger; Menuetto in B minor, from one of the organ symphonies of Widor, the organist of St. Sulpice, Paris; and an organ concerto by Handel. The "out-going" voluntary was Lemmens's famous "Storm" fantasia, a piece more striking than elevating. Of course this could hardly be regarded as an "out-going" performance, because the people were not—and rarely are now-a-days—inclined to go out when good music was being well played. It is time, indeed, to banish the old-fashioned term voluntary; to still terminate the service by all means with an organ piece in keeping with the season, occasion, and surroundings; and to gradually let the good sense of the people guide them to leaving the church afterwards and at the real termination of the service. It would be almost as reasonable and respectful to have an "out-going" sermon as to desire to retain an "out-going" voluntary. Lovers of organs and organ music will gladly note that the following leading organists will give recitals on the new organ: Dr. C. H. Lloyd, on the 26th ult., at 3; Mr. Alfred Hollins, on the 2nd inst., at 8; Dr. W. Creser, on the 16th inst., at 8; and Mr. A. Herbert Brewer, on the 23rd inst., at 3.

The organ is large and complete, the registers being thus apportioned: great organ, 13 stops; swell, 14 stops; choir, 10 stops; solo organ, 10 stops, two being on a heavy wind pressure of 12 inches; and pedal organ, 13 stops, including two "flue" and one "reed" stop of 32 feet, four "flue" and two "reed" stops of 16 feet, two "flue" and two "reed" stops of 8 feet, and one stop of 4 feet—a useful register for occasional solo employment in the works of Bach and some few other composers. The usual couplers and combination mechanisms are not wanting. Without being able to devote more space to a detailed description of this notable addition to the fine organs of the metropolis, it is desirable to note in the scheme a recognition of growing feeling in favour of a solid and more varied, and albeit much more expensive, building-up of satisfactory organ tone. This may be briefly stated by a resumé of the speaking compass of the stops, a statement organ players and the lovers of organ music generally will perfectly understand. In the scheme, with some 47 speaking registers, on the manuals the unison or diapason tone-platform of 8 feet pitch has assigned to it as the real "ground floor" of organ tone, so to speak, no less than 23 stops, with 7 of 16 feet compass and 9 of 4 feet range. The pedal organ, with an ample provision of some 13 registers, has a tone-platform of 6 stops of 16 feet compass, with 3 registers of 32 feet range, and with 3 stops of 8 feet compass. Like so many of the same builders' organs, this instrument has an undesirable absence of "reed tone" on the choir organ; an arrangement causing some inconvenience to the players of organ music written with a view to the presence of "reed" stops on every one of the manuals. Points of this kind call for the judgment of the performer, and are by no means within the range of the organ-builder's artistic opinions. Doubtless this noble instrument will be a great joy to the admirers of organ music and organ playing.

Of recent organ recitals, one given at the Parish Church, Ealing, by the accomplished organist, Mr. Owen H. Mead, included, in a well-arranged programme, Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C, of the toccata type, capitally played, a work not too frequently given. The late Henry Smart, when listening to this work played on the organ at the Royal Albert Hall, and following with pleasure its almost ceaseless "semiquaver" activity, exclaimed, "What a delightfully busy piece." Other works in the scheme were Merkel's "Variations on a Theme by Beethoven," and the late W. T. Best's excellent arrangement of Spohr's Overture in D, one of the best things of its kind.

A winter series of organ recitals has been given at the Parish Church of St. Helen's, Lancashire, by the organist, Mr. R. B. Woodward. The programme, extending over several months, included a number of standard and acceptable works, such as several of Henry Smart's excellent pieces. Smart, it will not be forgotten, carried a name which is still a special power in Lancashire and Yorkshire; works by Merkel, Tours, Wély, Guilmant, Silas, and Tietz are also included in Mr. Woodward's scheme.

That diligent recitalist, M. Auguste Wiegand, has not only played almost incessantly on the huge instrument at Sydney (N.S.W.), but has made a tour in England. His many programmes contain much that appeals to the popular mind, but it should be remembered the organist has a very decidedly educational work before him, in the exposition of the rich, intellectual stores of music written for the instrument, together with the performance of a judicious selection of good orchestral music; and it is not his particular business to strengthen and preserve the popular associations in connection with music which cannot be altogether regarded as suitable for the dignified tones of the king of instruments. In justice to the Sydney organist it must be stated that his very varied programmes do include the titles of many admirable works by Bach, Mendelssohn, and the composers of the present day.

WILLIAM THOMAS BEST.

Born, Carlisle, August 13, 1826.
Died, Liverpool, May 10, 1897.

Old and middle-aged organists who may read the following lines will recall the masterly organ playing of Mr. W. T. Best, and the younger generation who knew him not may be interested in learning something of the life-work of one who, in England, was justly designated the "Prince of Organists."

The son of a Carlisle solicitor, William Thomas Best, like Henry Smart, was to have followed the engineering profession, but music became his vocation. His first organ teacher was Young, organist of Carlisle Cathedral; he subsequently took lessons from John Richardson, a self-taught man, and organist of St. Nicholas Roman Catholic Church, Liverpool, and also from a blind organist. But these good men were of the old "G organ" school and therefore of limited use to an ambitious young fellow who wanted to play Bach as Bach was written. As a matter of fact, Best was largely self-taught. At the age of fourteen he obtained his first appointment as organist of Pembroke Road Baptist Chapel, Liverpool, where the organ had a CC pedal-board, the first of its kind in that city. Here the boy practised assiduously for four hours a day; he also, and very wisely, gave much attention to technical pianoforte studies. Seven years later (in 1847) he became organist of the Church for the Blind at Liverpool. One of his earliest public appearances in the concert-room was at a concert of ecclesiastical music given in December, 1849, by the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, to which he had been appointed organist. The young organist was thus criticised in the Musical World: "His [Mr. Sudlow's] place was filled by Mr. Best, a young musician of talent, though rather too fond of sacrificing the composer's ideas to his own facility." Best wrote to the Editor in reply: "Rest assured, Sir, that I claim no acquaintance with those musicians whose 'facility' leads them to vary the text of the composer by the introduction of embellishments, &c., or any other meretricious additions." At the same time he sent for review, at the Editor's "earliest convenience," some of his compositions, adding: "I hope you will consider the enclosed works a sufficient answer to the ignorant remarks of your Liverpool correspondent." He soon afterwards came to London, and in 1855 was organist (for a few months only) of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields and of Lincoln's Inn Chapel. Shortly before—in 1854, not in 1852, as is generally stated—Mr. Best came prominently before the public as a brilliant solo performer, by his recitals at the Panopticon (now the Alhambra) in Leicester Square, to which he had been appointed organist, and where a fine four-manual organ had been erected by Hill. His playing of Bach and other classical composers attracted much attention and greatly extended his fame in the metropolis. It seems that he was announced to give lessons on this instrument at a fee of twelve guineas for a course of twenty lessons, each of forty minutes duration. But he soon resigned the Panopticon appointment, because he very properly would not accede to the director's request that after the entertainment he should play out the audience to the strains of the "Wedding March"! The brevity of his three London appointments was soon to be compensated for by his long reign at the great seaport on the Mersey. In 1855 he was appointed by the Corporation organist of St. George's Hall, Liverpool, at a salary of £300 per annum, which was afterwards increased to £400. Here he presided at Willis's magnificent instrument for nearly forty years, and his recitals justly obtained for him a world-wide reputation. It may be interesting to our readers if we give the programme of his opening recital, which took place on May 1, 1855, in the presence of an audience numbering 2,000 persons:—

The National Anthem, with Variations and Finale	W. T. Best.

"The massive compositions of Bach, Beethoven, and Handel," said the correspondent of the Musical World, "were played by Mr. Best with that finish and chastity of style which have elevated him to so high a rank in his profession." The subject of his extemporisation was a "sort of 'storm piece.'"

Mr. Best's other church appointments, in addition to those already mentioned, were Wallasey Church (on the Cheshire side of the Mersey), 1860; Holy Trinity, Walton Breck, Liverpool, 1863; and West Derby Parish Church.

It would be impossible to name all the organs that Mr. Best "opened," the most important of which was Willis's gigantic instrument in the Royal Albert Hall, London, on July 18, 1871. His appearances at the Handel Festivals on Selection days were eagerly looked forward to by organists, who used greatly to enjoy the sang froid manner in which he would insist upon, and doggedly keep to, his own tempi of Handel's organ concertos, regardless of the exertions of the conductor in trying to keep the band and the organ together. In the early days (1859) of the Monday Popular Concerts he played solos on Gray and Davison's one-manual organ, then in St. James's Hall.

Although he made several important contributions to the literature of organ music, Mr. Best's fame will hardly rest upon his compositions. His "organ arrangements"—full and yet faithful to the original scores—are widely known and are unsurpassed. He edited Handel's organ concertos (issued by subscription) and Mendelssohn's and Bach's organ works. His "Art of Organ Playing," especially Part II., "Studies for the pedal," is an invaluable aid to the organ student. He also edited Handel's "Messiah," in which he incorporated Mozart's additional accompaniments. One of his most distinguished pupils is Dr. Swinnerton Heap, of Birmingham, but for many years he had relinquished teaching. The other events of Mr. Best's life may be briefly chronicled. In 1880 he was offered the option of knighthood or a Civil List pension of £100 per annum. As he disliked all kinds of titles—preferring to remain "Mr. W. T. Best"—he accepted the annuity. In 1890 he went to Australia to give recitals on the huge organ built by Hill, in the Town Hall, Sydney. His other travels included a visit to Italy, to inspect the Italian organs. In 1894, owing to continued ill-health, the great organist resigned his long connection with St. George's Hall, when the Corporation of Liverpool granted him a retiring allowance of £240 per annum.

The name of Best is so inseparably associated with the organ—upon which, in his day, he was the greatest English performer—that it will surprise many to learn he was also a very brilliant pianoforte player. He had a special gift for extracting a rich, beautiful tone from the domestic instrument, in addition to remarkable technical facility. After dinner, on condition that the room was partially darkened, he would play for an hour or two without intermission, to the delight of his fortunate and spell-bound listeners. His published pianoforte music, now almost forgotten, furnishes evidence of his complete knowledge of the capacities of the pianoforte keyboard.

Very little is known of Mr. Best's private life. Away from the organ he was very much of a recluse. Social functions he abhorred. All attempts to draw him out of his shell and to get him to associate with his professional brethren in public signally failed. He held aloof from the Royal College of Organists, and would not play on any pedal-board constructed to their scale. He was a master of ironical wit, and many stories are current of his pungent remarks when expressing his opinions, which were as outspoken as they were amusing.

The remains of Mr. Best were interred in the cemetery attached to Childwall Parish Church, Liverpool.

The portrait of the great organist, which appears as an extra Supplement in our present issue, is by Messrs. Elliott and Fry.

VICTORIAN ERA EXHIBITION.

The great exhibition at Earl's Court was opened on the 24th ult. by H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge. The ceremonial included the singing by the Exhibition choir, accompanied by Mr. Dan Godfrey's military band, of Cowen's Commemoration Ode, "All hail the glorious reign," which proved most effective.

The music section is intensely interesting. Mr. Imre Kiralfy was fortunate in securing the valuable services of Mr. Barclay Squire to arrange and catalogue the exhibits, and the result is most satisfactory. The fine collection of portraits of musicians, nearly 200 in number, at once attract attention. The Princess Louise lends a portrait of Paderewski, painted by herself. Thomas Attwood (a very pleasing likeness) and Alfred Novello are close together. C. E. Horn (the composer of "Cherry ripe"), Jenny Lind, and Sims Reeves all appear in costume. Of musicians, as they appeared in their earlier years, are the lineaments of Goring Thomas at the age of six, Sterndale Bennett as a young man, and Sir George Grove in middle age. The violin world is well represented by Lady Hallé, Joachim, and Sarasate; tonic sol-fa by Miss Glover and John Curwen. The Royal College of Music is represented by its genial Director, Dr. Hubert Parry, and the Master of the Queen's Musick appears in the person of Sir Walter Parratt. But we must leave the visitor to make his own acquaintance of the many musicians of note who adorn these walls.

Like the portraits, the autograph manuscripts which are here so skilfully displayed furnish a veritable embarras de richesses. Beginning with royalty, there is the MS. of a Kyrie composed by Princess Henry of Battenberg; also an unpublished theme by Schumann copied by Princess Christian. A full score of "St. Paul" contains an inscription by the Prince Consort, recording a performance of the work he attended in Exeter Hall in 1845. Miss Agnes Zimmermann lends a wooden fan on which are inscribed musical quotations by Brahms, Rubinstein, Madame Schumann, Sir Charles and Lady Hallé, Joachim, Piatti, and others. Mr. W. H. Cummings contributes largely from his fine collection, one of the autographs being a pianoforte arrangement of the "Wedding March" in Mendelssohn's own hand. A music-desk, decorated by Mendelssohn, is close to the composer's autograph pianoforte score of his oratorio of "Elijah," exhibited by his daughter, Mrs. Benecke. Mozart's corrections of Attwood's harmony exercises will naturally attract the notice of many visitors, as will also the manuscripts of such popular songs as Frederick Clay's "Sands of Dee" and Mr. C. K. Salaman's "I arise from dreams of thee." "Sketches" for the "Mikado," in addition to the full score of that amusing work, are lent by the composer, Sir Arthur Sullivan. We can only refer, and that very briefly, to a few of the remaining autographs of special interest. That of Professor Stanford's "Revenge" is enriched with the signature of Tennyson. Who ever has heard of J. W. Davison's overture "Fortunatus," composed in 1834? but here is the MS. of its full score. The following works by living composers, in their own handwritings, are also on view: Cowen's "Ruth," Randegger's "Fridolin," J. F. Barnett's "Ancient Mariner," Parry's "De Profundis," in addition to others too numerous to mention. There are also many letters, including some from Mendelssohn to Jenny Lind, Wagner to Roeckel, &c.

The music publishers' section, like the foregoing, can only be briefly chronicled. Messrs. Robert Cocks and Co. exhibit the MS. of Miss Lindsay's popular song "Tired," and autograph letters from Spohr and Czerny. Messrs. Cramer and Co. lend MSS. by Verdi, Balfe, and Vincent Wallace; while Messrs. Schott and Co.'s case contains autographs of a song by Wagner, a gavotte by Rubinstein, and a pianoforte piece by Liszt. Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. exhibit a collection of special interest. Here are the original assignments of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" and "Hymn of Praise," and of Gounod's "Mors et Vita." In strong contrast to the sums paid for the former works—thirty and twenty-five guineas respectively—is that of £4,000, which the French master received for his oratorio. Somewhat of a curiosity is a copy (now very scarce) of the first book of Mendelssohn's "Songs without words," but entitled "Original melodies for the pianoforte," published by Mr. Novello in 1832 "for the author," and the copy is initialed "I. M. [Ignaz Moscheles] for M. B. [Mendelssohn Bartholdy]." Side by side with their printed versions are the autographs of the following well-known works: Sullivan's "In Memoriam" overture, Mackenzie's Introduction to "Colomba," Gounod's "There is a green hill" (orchestral score), Parry's "Judith," Dvorák's "Patriotic Hymn," Cowen's "Four English Dances," Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," and Bridge's "Flag of England." There are also two works composed by Professor Herkomer and beautifully illustrated by that versatile artist, in addition to Captain Day's "Indian Musical Instruments," with some of the original drawings by William Gibb and their excellent reproductions in colours. Three very interesting letters must conclude this inadequate notice. One is from Dvorák, written in English, and begins: "You will be surprised to get an English letter from me. For a man, whose heart sticks to all what is English—and I am such a (sic) one—must do his best in order to express his feelings of gratitude in their own language." The other two letters are from Liszt to Mr. Littleton, in the first of which, dated October, 1885, he says: "After an interval of forty years I shall again visit London; for this I have to thank our most estimable friend, Walter Bache, and you." And after his visit to Sydenham he wrote: "Again heartfelt thanks for all your most friendly hospitalities in Westwood House and Dunedin House." Four life-size photographs of Liszt, Dvorák, Alfred Novello, and Henry Littleton, exhibited in this section, taken by Mr. Augustus Littleton, are excellent specimens of photographic portraiture.

A private view of the Victorian Era Exhibition enables us to speak in the highest terms of that portion of it which specially appeals to lovers of music, where they may spend a pleasant hour or two to their profit and enjoyment, in addition to the delights of the many other attractions which Mr. Kiralfy has so lavishly provided for his millions of visitors.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

Preceded by an operatic concert on the 8th ult., in aid of the Prince of Wales's Hospital Fund, the opera season at Covent Garden was opened on the following Monday with Gounod's "Faust," the title-rôle being sustained by M. Bonnard, and Madame Eames appearing as Marguerite. M. Bonnard's reading of the faithless lover was as conscientious as usual and marked by effective use of limited vocal means. The Marguerite of Madame Eames was the same as on many previous occasions. There was not the slightest suggestion of the Gretchen in the embodiment, rather was it a portraiture of a patrician damsel in reduced circumstances; but it was exquisitely refined, and the music was sung with superb beauty of voice and with rare expressive charm consistent with the conception of the character. The part of Valentine introduced a new-comer, M. Noté, the possessor of a fine baritone voice, but whose phrasing and style are very unfinished, and whose acting is equally rough. M. Meux, who also made his début here on this occasion, appeared as Wagner. The rest of the cast was made up by Madame Brazzi, Mdlle. Bauermeister, and M. Plançon, the last-named giving once more his unsurpassable impersonation of Mephistopheles.

The following night the same composer's "Roméo et Juliette" was mounted, the "pair of star-crossed" lovers being respectively personated by M. Scaramberg and Madame Saville, both of whom made their first appearance at Covent Garden. The former proved a tenor of moderate abilities, but the latter is a sympathetic artist who possesses a voice of silvery quality though somewhat limited in power. Mdlle. de Vigne appeared as the Page, and sang the fateful ballad very prettily. The remaining principal characters were personated by M. Plançon as the Friar, M. Bars as Mercutio, and M. Gilibert as Capulet.

M. van Dyck made his re-appearance in the title-rôle of "Tannhäuser" on the next evening, and showed that although the middle notes of his voice had become hard in quality, he had gained in power as an actor. Madame Eames being unable to appear as Elizabeth, the part was taken, without rehearsal, by Mdlle. Pacary, who thus made her début somewhat earlier than had been intended. This lady proved herself to be an experienced artist, but neither her singing nor acting showed more than average capacities. Madame Brazzi appeared as Venus, but with only moderate success; and M. Noté gave a very rough and unsympathetic reading of Wolfram. A good impression was made by M. Journet, another new-comer, as Hermann, and he is likely to prove a valuable addition to the company.

On the fourth night Verdi's "Aïda" was mounted, the performance being distinguished by the forcible embodiment of Amneris by Miss Marie Brema. Miss Susan Strong, who, it may be remembered, made so promising a début in the autumn of 1893, re-appeared on this occasion, and although she has still something to learn as an actress, she has made distinct advance as a vocalist, and the beautiful crystalline quality of her voice imparted peculiar charm to her singing as Aïda. Radames was impersonated by Signor Ceppi, one of the most promising of this season's new tenors. His voice is of excellent quality, and he sings with taste and dramatic perception. Signor Ancona presented a vivid portraiture of the Ethiopian King, and sang with remarkable power. Mr. Lemprière Pringle and M. Plançon were excellent exponents of the victorious King and the Priest.

Mdlle. Pacary made her second appearance the following evening as Valentine, in Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots," but failed to improve the impression she had previously made in "Tannhäuser." The florid music of the Queen was well suited to Miss Marie Engle's abilities and it was delightfully sung. Madame Brazzi was the Urbain. M. Noté's style was ill suited to the courtly De Nevers, but the fine tone of his voice made part amendment for his histrionic deficiencies. The part of Raoul brought forward another débutant, M. Dupeyron, who possesses some useful high notes, but who otherwise is wanting in the attributes which go to make a great artist. The cast also included M. Plançon, M. Journet, and M. Bars. The preceding performances had been conducted by Signor Mancinelli, but this opera was directed by M. Flon, who once more proved himself to be well fitted for the responsible position.

Gounod's "Faust" concluded the week, the cast being the same as on the opening night, with the exception that the title-rôle was sustained by M. van Dyck. This artist, it may be remembered, adopts a mediæval German dress for the part, a much more consistent procedure than the donning of a seventeenth century Italian costume in which the hero usually appears. M. van Dyck also discards the pantomimic change of dress in the first scene, and with good reason relies upon change of voice and bearing to convey the idea of Faust's sudden rejuvenescence.

The performance of "Carmen," on the 19th ult., introduced yet another tenor, M. Salignac, who made a most favourable impression by his embodiment of Don Jose. His abilities are greater as an actor than as a singer; but his voice, although not very powerful, is of excellent quality, well produced, and used in a manner that indicates an artistic temperament. The Carmen of Mdlle. Zelie de Lussan is too well known to need comment, and it is sufficient, therefore, to say that this lady was in excellent voice. Miss Marie Engle presented a most pleasing Michaela, and Frasquita and Mercedes were efficiently represented by Mdlle. Bauermeister and Mdlle. de Vigne. Signor Ancona sang very finely as Escamillo, and Messrs. Dufrane, Bars, Gilibert, and Rommy completed the cast. M. Flon conducted.

Massenet's dainty "Manon" was presented on the 21st ult., the fickle minded heroine being personated with discretion and much vocal charm by Madame Saville, who thereby may be said to have increased the favourable impression she had previously made. M. van Dyck being indisposed, M. Bonnard came to the rescue, and proved, as usual, an efficient substitute. M. Dufrane also elicited favourable opinions by his intelligent embodiment of Lescaut.

MM. Edouard and Jean de Reszke made their first appearance this season on the following evening, respectively as Heinrich der Vogler and Lohengrin. Both artists were in splendid voice, and once more showed themselves unsurpassed in their several parts; Madame Eames, as Elsa, acted with much greater warmth than hitherto, and sang magnificently. No less notable was the personation of Ortrud by Miss Marie Brema, who was most ably supported by Mr. David Bispham as Telramund. Mr. Lemprière Pringle also sang with noteworthy skill as the Heerrufer, and the interest of the performance was increased by its being conducted by Herr Anton Seidl, who, it may be remembered, directed the first performances in England in 1882 of Wagner's "Nibelung's Ring" at the old Her Majesty's Theatre. "Lohengrin" was sung in German by all the principal artists, and the interpretation may be said to have been the most complete ever given at Covent Garden. Not only were the characters represented in a manner it would be difficult to surpass, but the orchestral balance with the voices was admirably preserved and the choral portions admirably rendered, albeit they were sung in divers languages. Moreover, the actions and movements of the choristers were somewhat less artificial than usual, and the stage mounting showed some rational innovations, presumably due to the new stage manager, Mr. Friend, whose efforts deserve encouragement.

THE ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

On very few occasions has such enthusiasm been seen at the Albert Hall as on the 6th ult., when the Royal Choral Society concluded its twenty-sixth season by a commemoration concert in honour of the Queen's sixty years' reign. The evening was opened with Professor Bridge's new arrangement of the National Anthem, with the altered second verse written by the Very Rev. S. Reynolds Hole, Dean of Rochester, which runs as follows:

O Lord our God arise,
Scatter her enemies,
Make wars to cease;
Keep us from plague and dearth;
Turn Thou our woes to mirth;
And over all the earth
Let there be peace.

There are some conservative minds who may regret the banishment of the "knavish tricks" and aggressive spirit of the discarded verse, but it must be admitted that Dean Hole's lines are more consonant with the sentiment of modern Christianity. They are set for soprano solo, afterwards being repeated by the choir, of which the varied harmony has been taken from Attwood's anthem "I was glad," performed at the Queen's coronation. The solo part was sung by Madame Albani, and the last line, "Let there be peace," when taken up by the choir, made a most impressive effect. The programme proper began with Mr. Eaton Faning's "Queen's Song," the text of which, reflective of the spirit of to-day, has been written by Sir Edwin Arnold. The music is in part-song form, is well laid out for voices of average means, and, as sung on this occasion, proved highly effective. It was followed by Handel's anthems, "Zadok the Priest" and "The King shall rejoice," which formed part of the coronation music in 1838; but the most important performance of the evening was the production of Professor Bridge's spirited setting of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's poem "The Flag of England." This is no mere pièce d'occasion, the words being appropriate so long as Englishmen take pride in the prestige of their flag; and the music possesses a vigour and emotional life, combined with masterly craftsmanship, that will assuredly long appeal to all cultured musicians. The refrain, "What is the Flag of England?" announced by eight trumpets, gave a unity and martial character to the composition which had a most stirring effect; and the powerful suggestiveness of the answer of the North Wind opened the work in a most impressive manner. The treatment of the varied sentiments of the South, East, and West winds proved no less happy, great dramatic force being evident in several passages. The solo portion was sung by Madame Albani with much fervour, and the choristers have never fulfilled their duties with greater intelligence and ardour. At the close the enthusiasm of the audience was immense, and the applause only ceased after Professor Bridge had been recalled four times to the platform and expressed his regret that Mr. Kipling was not present. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" occupied the second half of the programme, the soloists engaged, in addition to Madame Albani, being Miss Anna Williams, Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Daniel Price.

QUEEN'S HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

To the excellent work during the past few months of the choir conducted by Mr. Randegger, must be added a thoroughly satisfactory performance of "St. Paul." At Queen's Hall, on the 13th ult., there could be no doubt that the choralists, appreciative of the task before them, were determined, by the display of conscientiousness combined with spirit, to offer the best possible tribute to the genius of the composer of such dignified, imposing, and beautiful numbers as "Rise up, arise," "O great is the depth," "Happy and blest," and "How lovely are the messengers." A more evenly balanced, careful, or generally finished rendering of these choruses, marking such important phases in the development of the sacred story, could not have been desired. The interspersed chorales, too, were delivered with the requisite solidity. Madame Clara Samuell sang the soprano solos with her accustomed refinement and unfailing regard for expression, and Miss Ada Crossley gave with adequate effect the delicious air "But the Lord is mindful." In the tenor recitatives, particularly Stephen's address, Mr. Edward Lloyd repeated one of his most notable declamatory triumphs. Mr. Andrew Black being indisposed, the music of the Apostle was sung by Mr. John Sandbrook, who exhibited dramatic impulse and a clear perception of other requirements in "Consume them all" and "O God, have mercy upon me." Mr. Louis Frolich commendably sang his share of the passages for the false witnesses, and Mr. Randegger kept his able forces well in hand throughout.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

When Professor Stanford's Pianoforte Concerto in G (Op. 59) was produced at the Richter concert of May 27, 1895, it was preceded by Wagner's Prelude and Liebestod ("Tristan") and Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. It was thus placed in juxtaposition with two of the most emotional, heartrending masterpieces of music. Moreover, the symphony was then played for the first time under the greatest of living conductors, and with such overwhelming effect that everything coming after it was dwarfed by comparison. After hearing Professor Stanford's work again at the third Philharmonic Concert, on the 5th ult., and under circumstances more favourable to forming a proper judgment of its merits, we are of opinion that it is amongst the composer's finest efforts. The flow of spontaneous melody, now frankly tuneful, deeply expressive, anon unaffectedly merry and sparkling; the brilliancy and beauty of the solo part, the charm of the orchestral accompaniments, and the refinement, alike in conception and workmanship, pervading every bar (and doubly welcome after the enormous quantity of "brutal" music which we have lately had to endure), make this concerto a feast alike for ear and mind. Mr. Leonard Borwick played it in his grandest style, with most brilliant technique and perfect realisation of the composer's intentions. Professor Stanford conducted, and, with the pianist, was recalled no less than three times. This proved once more that the public is not prejudiced against British music when it can be induced to listen to it. Another specimen of native music—Sir Arthur Sullivan's overture to Act IV. of Shakespeare's "Tempest"—opened the concert, the closing overture (if such a paradox may be permitted) being Beethoven's great "Leonore," No. 3. The symphony was Brahms's glorious No. 1 in C minor, which we hold with the writer of the analytical programme "will ever rank with the masterpieces of all time." Madame Sigrid Arnoldson sang two hackneyed show pieces and was rapturously applauded. Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted.

Mr. Hamish MacCunn represented British music at the fourth Concert, on the 20th ult., by his orchestral suite "Highland memories." The three pieces are very melodious and charming and characteristically Scotch; but they are mere trifles, and cause regret that a composer, who in his student days could write the bold, breezy, and bracing overture "Land of the mountain and the flood," should now content himself with such modest thumb-nail sketches as these "scenes." They were well played, under the composer's direction, and favourably received. Though Mr. Eugene d'Albert was born in these isles it is impossible to claim his Second Pianoforte Concerto in E (Op. 12) as a contribution to our native art, as the work betrays German influence in every bar. We confess unfeigned admiration for this brilliantly effective, concise, and virile work. Mr. d'Albert's ideas are those of a thinker possessing the genius to conceive and the power to execute works of art, which only reveal their full beauty and significance after repeated hearings. His music is indeed "mixed with brains," to quote one of the masters of a sister art, and it is only such music, showing in every bar deep thought allied to spontaneous invention, which will outlive a passing craze. There are some beautiful and beautifully treated melodies in this Concerto; the style is elevated, all prolixity is avoided, and when in the 'Ercles vein, the composer is at once impressive and exhilarating. Mr. d'Albert's playing of his own work and of Weber's Concertstück (in which he "tampered" with the music) was superb and created the utmost enthusiasm. A fair performance was given of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, and Madame Albani sang Mozart's "Non mir dir" and Handel's "Ombra mai fù," well known as the "Largo."

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Great musical interest has been excited in the second series of Mr. Newman's symphony concerts, which was begun on April 24, owing to the programmes being severally devoted to representative compositions of one of the most well-known composers. The first programme presented an excellent selection from the orchestral works of Brahms and included the "Tragic" Overture (Op. 81), the Second Symphony in D (Op. 73), and the academic "Festival" Overture (Op. 80), admirable readings of all of which were secured under the sympathetic and vigorous direction of Mr. Henry J. Wood. Madame Blanche Marchesi was the vocalist.

On the 1st ult. the position of honour was given to Grieg, and performances were given of the concert-overture (Op. 11) "In Autumn," the Pianoforte Concerto in A minor (Op. 16), the solo part of which was played by Miss Adela Verne; Hans Sitt's orchestral arrangement of the four Norwegian Dances (Op. 35), originally written as a pianoforte duets; the second "Peer Gynt" Suite, and the prelude, intermezzo, and triumphal march from the incidental music to Björnson's tragedy "Sigurd Jorsalfar" (Op. 56), the last-named having been first heard in England, under the composer's direction, at the Philharmonic Society's concert on May 24, 1894. The afternoon was also notable for the first performance in England of Anton Arensky's Symphony in B minor (Op. 4). As indicated by the opus number, the symphony is an early work, having been written when the composer was about twenty. The weakness shown in the power of development, and his unacquaintedness of effective orchestral combinations, may therefore fairly be ascribed to the inexperience of the writer; but the themes possess life and charm, and a conspicuous merit of the work is its clearness and simplicity of design.

The concert on the following Saturday brought forward Beethoven, whose Fifth Symphony in C minor received a magnificent interpretation. The solo of the Violin Concerto in D (Op. 61) was played by Herr Otto Spamer, who made his first appearance on this occasion, and created a favourable impression by reason of the correctness and conscientiousness of his playing, but whose power of expression is not yet equal to the demands of this music. The novelty at this concert was a Carnival Overture (Op. 45) by Alexander Glazounoff. The title of this work sufficiently indicates its poetic basis, and the music is of the bright and vivacious character expected. A peculiarity of this overture is the introduction of an organ solo, which provides a striking contrast to the context.

On the 15th ult. Tschaïkowsky occupied the entire programme, and first performances in England were given of two works of considerable importance, the overture to Tschaïkowsky's first opera, "Voivoda," and a Suite for orchestra (No. 3, in G, Op. 55). The overture is the most important number which remains of the opera, which was produced in January, 1869, but which so little pleased the composer that he subsequently burned the score. A dignified theme, partaking of the nature of ancient Greek Church music, opens the composition, and upon this melody is written several variations of great ingenuity, scored in a most picturesque manner. The variations are succeeded by a quick movement, which is interrupted by an Andante of graceful character. From the above description it will be gathered that in regard to form, this overture has little in common with works usually so named. The suite comprises four numbers, and possesses great musical interest. It opens with an "Elegy," the chief theme of which is characterised by dignity and pensive sentiment, attributes which dominate the movement. A waltz which follows is thoroughly Slavonic in nature and expression, and is followed by a vivacious Scherzo. The Finale consists of a melody of great beauty upon which are built twelve variations of great originality, the last of which is in the form of a Polacca. The Fourth Symphony in F minor (Op. 36), selected for performance, was first heard in England at the Philharmonic concert on June 1, 1893, when it was conducted by the composer. The first and second movements are marred by over-development, but the Scherzo and Finale are inspiriting music. In the former the strings play pizzicato throughout, deft use being made of the wood-wind and brass to secure contrast. The afternoon was concluded with the "Capriccio Italien" (Op. 45), a work which possesses little Italian character, but is full of Slavonic spirit and emotional expression.

Wagner having been born on May 22, 1813, the next concert wholly consisted of that master's works and included the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the overture and Venusberg music from "Tannhäuser," "Ride of the Valkyries," the "Trauermarsch" from "Die Götterdämmerung," and the Preludes to "Parsifal," to Act III. of "Die Meistersinger," and the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde." The vocalist was Mr. Louis Fröhlich, a young baritone of great promise, who sang excerpts from "Tannhäuser." The high standard attained at the first series of these concerts has not only been fully maintained during the past month, but distinct advance had been made in unanimity of attack and expression, and specially in the phrasing and in delicacy of tone in soft passages. Mr. Wood has also shown greater perception of the idiosyncrasies of the various composers whose works he has conducted, and very much may be expected from him and his magnificent orchestra.

MOTTL CONCERTS.

The chief features of the concerts given at the Queen's Hall on the 11th and 18th ult., under the direction of Herr Felix Mottl, were the performances of the second part from the second act and the greater portion of the third act from "Parsifal." The programme attracted large audiences, and the renderings were as effective as they could be made in the concert-room. On the 11th ult. the second portion from the second act was given in its entirety, the title-rôle being sustained by Herr Heinrich Vogl, who had a reception which showed that his fine impersonations at the old Her Majesty's Theatre in 1882, when the "Ring" was performed for the first time in England, had not been forgotten. Time has dealt very leniently with his magnificent voice and increased his power of dramatic expression, and his singing in "Parsifal" and his rendering of the "Spring Song" from "Die Walküre" were superb examples of vocal declamation. The music of Kundry was excellently declaimed by Frau Mottl, and the few words of Klingsor were capably delivered by Mr. Charles Copland. The parts of the six maidens were intelligently sung by Misses Esther Palliser, Agnes Nicholls, Hilda Foster, Helen Jaxon, Eleanor Jones, and Ruby Shaw; and the choral portion was interpreted by the female choir from the Royal College of Music, whose fresh young voices and admirable training contributed in no small degree to the effectiveness of the interpretation. The remainder of the programme consisted of the overture to Weber's "Oberon," the reading of which was characterised by exaggeration of contrasts of tonal force, the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," and Smetana's symphonic poem "Aus Bohmen's Hain und Fleur." The last-named, which is the fourth of a series of six works in similar form entitled "Mein Vaterland," had not previously been heard in England. The music is intended to suggest the peace which is supposed by poets to prevail in the country on a lovely summer day, and the subsequent joys of a peasant holiday; but, as a matter of fact, the music possesses so little distinctiveness that the listener has no occasion to trouble about its poetic basis.

The concert on the 18th ult. was opened with Berlioz's third symphony, "Harold in Italy," which was finely interpreted, the violin solo part being very effectively played by Mr. Michael Balling on the viola-alta, an instrument which, owing to its size and certain peculiarities of construction, emits a richer and more powerful tone than the ordinary viola, a matter of importance when this music is played by Herr Mottl's powerful orchestra. The rendering showed that Herr Mottl is thoroughly in sympathy with Berlioz's music, but no skill can impart interest to the last movement. which, however, is not astonishing, seeing that its poetic basis is an "Orgy of Brigands," with whose doings St. Cecilia can have little sympathy. The excerpts from the last act of "Parsifal" commenced where Gurnemanz perceives the approach of the "Pure Fool." This part was sung with due dignity by Herr Wachter, and Mr. David Bispham declaimed the words of Amfortas with his usual dramatic perception. Herr Vogl sustained the title-rôle. The male as well as the female choirs of the Royal College of Music were called upon on this occasion, and fully merited the confidence placed in them. The orchestral part was magnificently played, and the effect of the great climax where the bells are heard was made more than usually impressive by the use of the new apparatus, introduced for the first time on this occasion, and which, when not struck too hard, fairly imitates deep bell-like tones.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

Nothing could more appropriately commemorate this eventful year of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee at the Crystal Palace than the Imperial Victorian Exhibition. Here, under the same glass roof which covered the great Exhibition of 1851 in Hyde Park, has been gathered together various specimens of the arts and crafts of the reign which will be sure to attract many visitors to Sydenham during the next few months. The music section, which is located in the Egyptian Court, though somewhat limited in extent, has several points of interest. Its principal feature is the collection of the late Sir Michael Costa, kindly lent by Madame Raphael Costa, which is much too extensive to describe in detail. Costa seems to have been a favourite in royal and aristocratic circles, judging from the number of albums containing letters and mementos of many distinguished people. Of special interest is the MS. of a libretto for a cantata on the subject of Prometheus and Pandora, written by the great Duke of Wellington. The manuscript, probably dating from the Iron Duke's college days, consists of about 150 lines, and, judging from the manner in which the corrections have been made, seems to have been put to paper at one setting. A huge and elaborate baton, presented to Costa in 1876 by members of the Glasgow Choral Union, might very well do for a life-preserver.

A curious exhibit is a small card on which are six miniature razors, about an inch long, having ivory handles and silver blades. These were presented to Costa, then a beardless youth of about twenty, by the gentlemen of the orchestra at the King's Theatre in 1830, when he was appointed maestro al piano. In later years no one would have dared to play such pranks with the autocratic conductor; and it is said that he once addressed a facetious member of his band to this effect: "Mr. ——, I hear you are fond of jokes. Please understand that your first joke with me will be your last." From Costa to Mr. Manns is a natural transition, and in a large case the visitor will find a splendid collection of testimonials presented to the veteran conductor who has held sway over the music at the Crystal Palace for nearly the whole of its history. Sir George Grove is very naturally an exhibitor. He has lent MSS. by S. Wesley, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn. The autograph of the full score of Sir Alexander Mackenzie's breezy overture "Rule, Britannia," rightly finds a place in this collection. By permission of the Queen, Messrs. John Broadwood and Sons exhibit a handsome grand pianoforte from the Red Drawing-room at Windsor Castle. This instrument, which is in a splendid state of preservation, although it has been much played upon, was in the great Exhibition of 1851, and was then selected by the Prince Consort for Her Majesty's use.

THURSDAY SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS.

Mr. Hans Brousil went to a somewhat unfamiliar source for the materials of the first part of his third concert of the season at Queen's (Small) Hall. As a composer Davidoff is best known in this country in connection with the violoncello, so that it was with some curiosity many of the audience on April 29 awaited the performance of his Quintet in A minor (Op. 40) for pianoforte, two violins, viola, and violoncello. The issue was more gratifying than some may have anticipated, for the work is interesting and pleasing, though it cannot be ranked among high class productions in this department of art. Everything possible was done for it by Messrs. Franz Liebich, Alexander Kummer, Wallace Sutcliff, E. Tomlinson, and Brousil, and the first movement was deservedly applauded. Miss Agnes Witting tastefully gave a couple of songs, and Mr. Brousil ended the selection with a finished performance of the Romance (Op. 23) and "Am Springbrünnen" (Op. 20, No. 2), the latter of which is such a favourite with violoncellists. In the miscellaneous section Mr. Liebich played with sufficient spirit Liszt's Grand Polonaise in C major, Mr. Kummer contributed violin solos, and Mr. Brousil delighted his hearers with Popper's Tarantella (Op. 35).

At the final concert, on the 13th ult., there was, by desire, a repetition performance of Beethoven's Septet, this ever-welcome work being conscientiously rendered by Messrs. Emile Sauret, Sutcliff, Haydn Waud, G. A. Clinton, E. F. James, A. Borsdorf, and Brousil, and again holding attention from beginning to end. The opportunity for hearing such a masterpiece under favourable conditions was evidently appreciated. Subsequently Messrs. Sauret and Brousil played solo pieces, and Madame Minna Fischer successfully sang.

ROYAL ARTILLERY BAND CONCERT.

No concerts of their kind are more acceptable than those occasionally held at Queen's Hall by the splendid force of instrumentalists so ably conducted by Cavaliere L. Zavertal. Of Mozart's Symphony in G minor a very good performance was given on April 23, the Andante and Menuetto being played with the utmost care, whilst irresistible spirit marked the rendering of the glorious Finale. A novelty was the introduction to Rozkosny's opera "Die Moldaunixe," a bright and tuneful piece executed with admirable point and precision. Other pieces specially well received were the delightfully melodious Menuet and Farandole from Bizet's second "L'Arlésienne" suite and Gounod's "Meditation," neither of which could have obtained better interpretation. Signor Mancinelli's stirring "Cleopatra" overture was also rendered in a highly satisfactory manner. Tschaïkowsky's moving "Marche Solennelle" and the "Tannhäuser" overture respectively opened and closed the attractive programme.

THE BOHEMIAN STRING QUARTET.

The sixth and seventh concerts given in this country by the Bohemian String Quartet took place on the 3rd and 13th ult. respectively, at St. James's Hall. At the former the programme included Tschaïkowsky's Quartet in F (Op. 22). This work is not so distinctive as the one in D (Op. 11), nor is it as memorable as that in E flat (Op. 30), but it is music well worthy of the great Sclavonic composer, and as interpreted by these highly finished executants its expressive melodies and their picturesque treatment were very pleasant to listen to. A fine interpretation was also given at this concert of Schumann's Quintet in E flat (Op. 44), the pianoforte part of which was played by Mdlle. Johanna Heymann.

On the 13th ult. the party appeared in the evening, when the first performance in England took place of a quartet in F (Op. 119), by Karel Bendl, the composer of many Czechish national operas, choral works, and songs. The quartet is dedicated to the Bohemian String Quartet, and could have no more sympathetic exponents. It opens with an expressive theme, which in various guises is constantly heard in the first movement. This is followed by a vivacious presto, which in turn gives place to an Adagio which would be more acceptable were it shorter. No such complaint can, however, be preferred against the Finale, which is remarkable for vigour and terseness of utterance. Beethoven's Quartet in G (Op. 18) and Schubert's posthumous work in like form, in D minor, completed the selection. The other concerts which were announced have had to be abandoned this season, owing to Herr Oskar Nedbal, the viola player of the party, being obliged to return to the Continent.

WALENN CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The interesting series of chamber concerts given by Messrs. Walenn at the Queen's (Small) Hall was concluded on April 27, when the first performance in England took place of a recently written Trio in E minor (Op. 51) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by Edward Schütt. The work comprises four movements, of which the first and second are the best; but in its entirety the composition is manly, bold, and spirited. Its themes are significant and suggestive, and their development rational, clear, and consistent with their character. The work is Slavonic in spirit, but is tempered by Western influences, and in this respect presents an attractive study to the cultured musician. It was effectively interpreted by Miss Maude Rihll, Mr. Gerald Walenn, and Mr. Herbert Walenn, who also severally played solos on their respective instruments with much taste and skill. The vocalists were Miss Esther Palliser and Mr. Arthur Walenn, the selection of the former including a quaint little ditty possessing considerable originality, entitled "A Mad Maid's Song," by Landon Ronald.

MR. DAVID BISPHAM'S CONCERT.

One of the most interesting chamber performances during the past month was that given by Mr. David Bispham, at St. James's Hall, on the afternoon of the 10th ult. This was a Brahms "In Memoriam" performance, and it opened appropriately with the "Four Serious Songs," founded on words from the Bible and the Apocrypha. These are sombre but very eloquent lyrics, the third, "Oh, death, how bitter art thou unto him that dwelleth in peace," being especially beautiful. Following upon these came the entire series of fifteen Lieder entitled "Magelone" (Op. 33). The words of these are translated from the German of L. Tieck, and they embody a pretty fairy story after the manner of Grimm, the Countess d'Aulnay, and Hans Andersen. The songs are all full of life, chivalry, and love, and among the most effective are "Sind es Schmerzen," the slumber ditty "Ruhe, Süssliebchen," and the lively "Geliebter, wo zaudert dein irrender Fuss." Many of the Lieder were interpreted with the utmost intelligence by Mr. Bispham, and others were equally well sung by Miss Rosa Olitzka, Miss Marie Engle, and Mr. Reginald Groome; the accompaniments being rendered to perfection by Mr. Leonard Borwick. The interest of the performance was much enhanced by Mr. Bispham's clear delivery of a resumé of the original story, which he told in the language of fairy lore, commencing with "Once upon a time" and ending with "They were married and lived happily ever after," or words to that effect. A repetition of this delightful performance should be announced at the earliest convenient date.

VARIOUS CONCERTS AND RECITALS.

Performances of every sort have been so numerous within the past few weeks that many must necessarily pass without notice. Among the new-comers was Mr. Hyllested, a native of Denmark, who gave an orchestral and choral concert at St. James's Hall on the evening of the 4th ult. The programme, consisting of only three pieces, looked brief in print, but it proved very wearisome in performance. After Mr. Hyllested had given a delicate but rather weak performance of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, known as the "Emperor," under the direction of Mr. Gustav Ernest, he conducted a symphonic poem for orchestra, ending with a double chorus based on the 150th Psalm and the Lord's Prayer. With the exception of the second movement, a Scherzo, which is comparatively cheerful and not too prolonged, the work is terribly tedious, though the composer shows some knowledge of the art of scoring. The audience melted away rapidly, few remaining to hear Mr. Hyllested play Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat. A recital was announced for Monday afternoon, the 17th ult., but it did not take place.

The pianoforte recitals given by Mr. Frederic Lamond at St. James's Hall, on the 4th and 11th ult., were not so well attended as they should have been. The Scottish pianist has recently won laurels on the Continent, and may now be regarded as a finished artist, though he gives more satisfaction in intellectual than in what may be termed sentimental music. Thus in the first recital Mr. Lamond was heard to far less satisfaction in pieces by Chopin and in Schumann's "Carnaval" than in Brahms's vigorous Sonata in F minor (Op. 5), which was very finely interpreted. At the second performance excellent results were obtained in Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata in C (Op. 53) and in Schumann's rarely-heard Sonata in F sharp minor (Op. 11). Mr. Lamond is one of the foremost pianists of the day, and in course of time this fact will surely be recognised by the English public.

Mr. Esposito, who gave a pianoforte recital at St. James's Hall, on Thursday, the 6th ult., is an artist who appeared at the Princes' Hall six years ago. He cannot be described as a powerful executant, but he plays with grace and finish, and, after giving Beethoven's familiar Variations in C minor, Schumann's Sonata in F sharp minor, and smaller compositions by older composers, Mr. Esposito introduced no fewer than six genre pieces of an agreeable character from his own pen. He will be heard again with pleasure.

Mr. Henry Such gave another violin recital at St. James's Hall on the 12th ult. and fully confirmed the favourable opinions previously conceived of him as an executant. After taking part with Mdlle. Johanna Heymann in Beethoven's tuneful Sonata in G for pianoforte and violin (Op. 30, No. 3), Mr. Such played Max Bruch's somewhat neglected Concerto in D minor (No. 2), with pianoforte accompaniment by Mr. Henry Bird. In these, as in smaller solos, Mr. Such displayed first-rate technique; and Mdlle. Heymann, in various pianoforte solos, as well as Miss Marie Cabrera, in songs by Franz and Schubert, afforded much satisfaction to the audience.

The vocal recital given by Madame Blanche Marchesi on Friday afternoon, the 14th ult., at St. James's Hall, once more displayed in fullest measure the versatility of this accomplished artist. She sang, in Italian, airs by Handel and Schubert; in German, Lieder by Schumann and Brahms; and in French, by Godard, Charpentier, and Ernest Moret, in all showing consummate skill in vocalisation and artistic intelligence in the interpretation of the words. Again we say that Madame Marchesi, at her recitals, affords valuable lessons to young and aspiring singers. The violoncello solos, admirably rendered by Mr. Henry Bramsen, gained all the applause they deserved.

At a second recital in the same hall, on the 21st ult., the accomplished vocalist interpreted a selection of lyrics of great musical interest with equal skill, and was again ably assisted by Mr. Henry Bramsen.

Messrs. Ross and Moore afforded much pleasure to a numerous audience at their second recital of ensemble pianoforte playing on the afternoon of April 27, at St. James's Hall. As was noted on the previous occasion, these young artists play together like one man, and in Mozart's Sonata in D, Schumann's elaborate Variations in B flat (Op. 46), and various pieces by Kirchner, Liszt, and Chopin, the last taken from a series arranged by Professor Oscar Raif, they showed to what perfection duet execution on the pianoforte can be brought. Mrs. Hutchinson contributed songs by Durand, J. J. Rousseau, and Brahms in her customary agreeable manner.

A series of trio concerts is being given by that capable pianist, Mr. Isidor Cohn, at the Steinway Hall, and the first performance took place on Friday evening, the 7th ult. The first part of the programme was devoted to Brahms, and an excellent performance was secured of the Pianoforte Trio in C (Op. 87), a concise and genial work, Mr. Cohn being assisted by Mr. Gompertz and Mr. Whitehouse, who subsequently took part in Beethoven's great Trio in B flat (Op. 97). The concert-giver played some of Brahms's pieces for pianoforte solo, and Miss Fillünger was heard to much advantage in some Lieder. Mention only can be made of the second concert, on the 17th ult. The trios were Robert Volkmann's in B flat minor and Mendelssohn's in C minor; pianoforte solos by Chopin and Rubinstein, and various songs. The violinist on this occasion was Mr. C. H. Elderhorst and Mrs. Hutchinson was the vocalist. The final concert will take place on the 2nd of the present month.

A very large audience assembled at the concert of the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society in the Queen's Hall, on the 19th ult. The chief pieces in the scheme were Wagner's "Siegfried" Idyll, Mr. Edward German's Gipsy Suite, and a new "Diamond Jubilee" overture by the society's conductor, Mr. George Mount. It is a well written and melodious piece, without much originality, but sufficiently jubilant in character. One of the most interesting features of the programme was "King Robert of Sicily," with Mr. John E. West's clever incidental music, Longfellow's verse being again ably recited by Mr. Charles Fry. This version of a beautiful legend is certain to become popular.

The two pianoforte recitals given by Mr. Eugene d'Albert, at St. James's Hall, on the 13th and 21st ult., were very well attended, and the young Anglo-German musician seems to have fully reinstated himself in the favour of the English musical public, for his efforts were enthusiastically received. On the first occasion he opened with his own Sonata in F sharp minor, a clever work in three movements, rather suggestive of Liszt. Other pieces were Beethoven's lovely Rondo in G (Op. 51, No. 2), Grieg's piquant Ballade in G minor (Op. 24), and Chopin's Ballade in A flat (Op. 47), all of which were brilliantly played.

The second recital opened with Beethoven's two final Sonatas in A flat (Op. 110) and C minor (Op. 111). The rendering of both was marked by breadth of style and intellectuality far above the average, and in Chopin's Ballade in G minor, which followed, the artist displayed rapidity in execution which was simply astounding. Other pieces by the Polish composer were given with equal effect, reminding the hearer sometimes of Hans von Bülow and sometimes of Rubinstein.

THE MUSICAL ARTISTS' SOCIETY.

We were pleased to notice that the performances at the society's eighty-first concert, given on the 10th ult., at St. Martin's Hall, showed a distinct improvement on those given on some previous occasions. Mr. R. H. Walthew's Clarinet Trio in C minor, which opened the programme, is in several respects a charming work. Knowing the capabilities of his instrument thoroughly well, the clever young composer of "The Pied Piper of Hamelin" has, in this trio, produced some well written and well sounding pages in which considerable warmth of feeling is united to musicianly treatment of melodious and expressive thematic material. Of the five movements we prefer the opening Allegro non troppo, with its excellent first subject, and the Poco allegretto, a dainty, captivating movement in waltz rhythm. The work was well played by Mr. Julian Egerton (clarinet), Miss Edie Reynolds (violin), and the composer (pianoforte). It is difficult to speak of Dr. F. E. Gladstone's String Quartet in G with equanimity. Here is a work by an excellent musician, doubtless correct in every detail of grammar and form, well laid out for the instruments and free from blemishes, but which failed to interest because the life-giving quality of imagination was lacking. True, the Adagio created a good impression, but it seemed the manner of expressing himself—i.e., the effective disposition of the instruments and the excellent part-writing—rather than the matter expressed, which helped the composer to success. The interpreters were Misses Marie Motto and Mary Noverre, Messrs. Alfred Hobday and B. Albert, who did full justice to the work. A number of more or less insignificant songs by Dr. W. H. Longhurst, Messrs. Walter Head, Arthur Gilbertson, and Charles Lawrence, a vocal duet by Miss Alice Borton, Mozart's Clarinet Quintet in A, and Moscheles's pianoforte duet "Hommage à Handel" completed a very lengthy programme.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.

Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland commenced, on the 22nd ult., at the Royal Institution, a series of four lectures on "Music in England during the reign of Queen Victoria." The lecturer said that for the first thirty years of the Queen's reign there was no appreciation of music amongst the general public. English people, and more particularly English men, had thought it right to assume an indifference to the art, as if it were something to be ashamed of. Even a few years ago the average English gentleman would have considered it beneath his dignity to admit that he cared in any degree for one tune more than another. This affectation of musical ignorance seemed to have begun in the last century, and was in full swing at the time of the Queen's accession. Music, seriously regarded, held no place in the national life. Society permitted the young gentlemen of the time, during the period of paying their addresses to young ladies, to play a little on the flute; but to sing was going rather far, and for a man to play the pianoforte was to risk the respect of his class. Fiddle playing, which, of course, had not been attempted by ladies, was considered a mark of slight mental aberration. To these circumstances must be attributed the exceedingly small quantity of good music produced in England during this period. A few enthusiasts, however, made possible the existence of various musical bodies, such as the Sacred Harmonic and Philharmonic, but Society itself only supported Italian opera. By descriptions of programmes and quotations from contemporary criticisms which appeared in the Musical World, the lecturer gave a very clear idea of the musical taste of the day, and other subjects considered were the influence of Mendelssohn on English music, the valuable work done by the Wesley family, the development of organ building, Berlioz's visit to London, and the music performed at the Great Exhibition of 1851.

Musical illustrations were given by Miss Agnes Zimmermann, who played an Allegretto in D flat by Cipriani Potter, and by Miss Louise Dale, who sang with great charm and finish "Tell me, my heart" (Bishop), "Rise, gentle moon" (John Barnett), and "The dirge of the flowers" (T. A. Walmisley).

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. A. H. D. Prendergast read a comprehensive paper, entitled "The Masque of the Eighteenth Century," before the Musical Association, on the 11th ult., at the Royal College of Organists. The lecturer said the masque of the English Court in the seventeenth century was the most vigorous and cultivated descendant of a long line of gradually elaborated progenitors. Both Italy and England had their share in the nurture and improvement of this species of entertainment. Its origin and earlier cultivation pertained to Italy, and its final and most successful development belonged to our own country. The lecturer sought the origin of the masque in Pagan Rome and in the improvisatory farces of the Osci. The earliest attempts to refine the entertainment of the Carnival were made in Italy, particularly at Florence, where the inventive genius of the artists endowed the street shows and pageants with ever increasing magnificence, until at the opening of the fifteenth century it had become usual to have large processions, sometimes representative of the return of triumphant warriors, with trophies, cars, and other devices. In the fifteenth century the intervention and patronage of the Medici family, and specially that of Lorenzo Medici, born January 1, 1448, gave new spirit and greater refinement to these amusements. He not only wrote a large number of carnival songs, but induced several of his contemporaries to employ their talents in similar compositions, which in the next century were collected by Anton Francesco Grazzini, commonly called "Il Tasca," and published in Florence in the year 1559. An account of pageants and processions in England was given in Horne's "Ancient Mysteries," published in 1823, the earliest therein mentioned being that exhibited in London when Queen Eleanor rode through the city to her coronation in 1236. The lecturer then described a few of the most celebrated masques and pageants which took place in England down to the time of James the First, and referred to the final elaborations of the Jacobean Court masques by Ben Jonson and contemporary poets, architects, and musicians.

Some interesting additional information on the subject was contributed by Mr. W. H. Cummings, who occupied the chair, and who reminded his listeners of the most beautiful of all masques, Milton's "Comus."

"SIXTY YEARS OF MUSIC."

Such was the title of Professor Bridge's discourse, delivered on April 28, at the Crystal Palace, in connection with the series of lectures being given in commemoration of the Queen's reign. The lecturer divided his subject into the various branches of the art, appropriately commencing with a brief survey of the general state of musical education in 1837, which presented a striking contrast to the opportunities and means now provided for the acquirement of musical knowledge. With regard to public performances the lecturer said that in 1837 the Philharmonic Society was in its twenty-fifth season, and had been instrumental in introducing many distinguished foreign artists and had produced works of art which afterwards became famous. Schubert's music, excepting a few songs, was as yet unknown, and the works of J. S. Bach were unfamiliar to many musicians. The first distinguished Bach propagandist in England was old Samuel Wesley, who died in 1837. He, with C. F. Horn, Benjamin Jacob, and Vincent Novello, worked hard by precept and practice to popularise the Leipzig Cantor's works, and the advent to our shores of the enthusiastic young Mendelssohn brought the agitation to a climax. On September 12, 1837, Mendelssohn and Wesley met at Christ Church, Newgate Street, when the former played the great A minor Fugue, and Wesley, for the last time, extemporised in his inimitable manner. A month later he was dead. The period immediately before the Victorian era represented the darkness which precedes a new day. For a time the worst productions of the decadent eighteenth century had superseded the fine Church music of the seventeenth. Weakness and inanity in composition and carelessness in performance characterised the cathedral music of the first three decades of the nineteenth century. The parish churches were in worse plight. Choirs worthy of the name hardly existed, and organs were almost unknown except in the larger town churches. Dulness and apathy prevailed everywhere. The period, however, of our Queen's accession, which marked the commencement of progress in so many arts, sciences, and in commerce, witnessed also a revival in Church music. Popular education carried with it new influences towards the popularising of musical knowledge. We owed much to the tonic sol-fa pioneers for their inculcation of the important principle of tonal relationship, but their use of another notation was to be regretted. Almost coincident, in point of time, with the awakening of interest in popular singing classes, was the revolution in the music trade caused by the issue of cheap copies of the vocal classics. There was no need to discuss the point whether the late J. Alfred Novello merely supplied an existing popular demand, or whether his bold project to produce the oratorios at prices within the reach of all preceded and created that demand. The fact remained that he was a pioneer in this work when, in 1846, he commenced the issue of the world-famed octavo series. Improvements in music-type setting made it possible to discard the slow and costly engraving process; and when the cheaper copies began to pour out from the Dean Street premises, far from the popular demand being soon satisfied, it spread and strengthened until the whole land was filled with oratorio choirs. Church music and other branches had also benefited by the revolution (for it was nothing else), and to-day we saw the results of those movements—popular teaching and cheap publishing—in the almost universal love of our people for good music, and in the widespread knowledge of the works of the great masters. Reviewing the present time, the lecturer said that an enormous appetite for musical training had been created. In instrumental teaching, notational, muscular, and æsthetic training were being separated and dealt with individually, instead of en masse and imperfectly. The system of muscular training, based on sound physiological principles, which has recently been introduced with much success by Mr. Macdonald Smith, seemed likely to be one of the most valuable weapons which had been added to the armoury of the modern teacher during this century. It aimed to meet the ever-growing demands upon technical and physical endurance, demands of which our ancestors could have had no conception. Thanks to the labours of Goss, Macfarren, Gadsby, Ouseley, Banister, Stainer, Prout, Parry, and many others, we now possessed a complete library of works on harmony, counterpoint, orchestration, form, &c., besides excellent translations of the writings of distinguished Continental musicians. Lectures on music brought a knowledge of the art to those who did not read scientific treatises, the musical press was never more active and influential, and the "annotated programme" was an important wheel in the educational machine. In Church music, the labours of Barnby and Stainer, building on the foundation by Elvey, Attwood, and Goss, were now bearing fruit, and had lifted the art in both cathedrals and parish churches into a region to which the most sanguine of our grandfathers could hardly have aspired. Music had received much encouragement at the hands of the royal family; the Queen and the late Prince Consort were both sincere lovers of it, and their influence during the first few years of the reign was an active one, and the interest of the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Saxe-Coburg had been personal and unflagging.

INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

Mr. J. E. Borland read a vivacious paper, entitled "Conventionalities of the Concert-room," at the meeting of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, on the 8th ult., at 20, Hanover Square. The lecturer said the prevalent Continental idea that the art spirit had but a meagre and attenuated existence in England was based no doubt upon imperfect observation; but we could not blame outsiders if they estimated us in art by our productions and practices. It was not only the fittest things which survived. With how many concert schemes were we not familiar in which a dreary round of worn-out masterpieces were gone through each season? Absence of initiative characterises nine-tenths of them. It was customary to commence with a Bach prelude and fugue (usually perverted from one intended for the organ), a Beethoven sonata (choice limited to four or five), some Chopin pieces (there were about twelve orthodox ones to select from), and a Liszt rhapsody. These formed the backbone of every great pianoforte recital from January to December. All went through the same tasks, presumably to show that they could play Bach, Chopin, &c. Unfortunately the result sometimes showed that they could not do so, but fashion decreed that the attempt must be made. Few seemed to study their individual fitness for certain kinds of music, and thus we had bad Beethoven from a man who could play Chopin divinely, and modern Hungarian music from a player whose whole sympathies were with Bach. Mozart symphonies and Wagner selections were performed with the same force of stringed instruments, whereby the works of the elder masters were simply travestied. The cantatas of Bach were sung by immense choirs which murdered his part-writing, intended for a few picked vocalists; and Handel was accompanied by the orchestra of Meyerbeer, and dressed up with nineteenth century orchestration, like a Greek statue in a Bond Street costume. Why did our orchestras tune in the concert-room? Only because they had always done so. No one would tolerate a pianoforte tuner delaying his work until the audience had assembled. When were we to see the end of exaggerated phrasing, the vocal display upon high notes, and the absurd dwelling upon the penultimate note of a melody! Unfortunately many of the leading singers set bad examples to their juniors. When a great tenor finished "Thou shalt dash them" with a top A in the last phrase, smaller tenors feel impelled to imitate him lest the public should think they were unable to do so. A basso profundo took a low D "in the turning worm" passage in the "Creation," and other basses felt called upon to show that they also possessed a low D. It had been cleverly said that "although imitation was the sincerest form of flattery, it was often the flattest form of insincerity." All our talk about art had so far left untouched one of the most barbarous customs which prehistoric man had passed down to us—viz., applause. It was an anachronism, a brutal, heathenish method of showing enjoyment, which ought to be beneath the contempt of an educated nineteenth century audience. Perhaps the ideal concert was impossible of attainment, but a high standard could not be reached without aiming still higher. If music were to us no mere trade or means of existence, we must be exacting in our demands on its behalf. If it were indeed to us something akin to the highest form of religion, an embodiment to our emotional natures of the eternals, Love, Beauty, Truth, we should not be backward in claiming for it the highest position in the temple of art, where envy gave place to love, ugliness to beauty, and the false and conventional to the true.

"LA BOHÈME" AT MANCHESTER.

With the production of Puccini's romantic opera "The Bohemians" ("La Bohème") at the Theatre Royal, Manchester, on April 22, the Royal Carl Rosa Company practically brought its season in Cottonopolis to a close; and as the production was a huge success there is every chance of this wholly charming opera occupying a very prominent position in the company's répertoire when it comes to London for its two months' season in October next.

It is odd that Murger's book, "La Vie de Bohème," upon which Signori Giuseppe Giacosa and Luigi Illica have based their libretto, should have remained for many years on the shelf practically ignored, only to be taken down now and converted, at any rate in its main theme, into an operatic book for two of the shining lights of modern Italy—Puccini and Leoncavallo. The latter's opera on the subject has, at the time of writing, only just been produced, so that at present no opportunity has arisen for instituting a comparison between the two; but it is safe to assert that if Leoncavallo has advanced as far since "I Pagliacci" as Puccini since "Manon," the operatic prospects of Italy are of the brightest. Of Puccini's progress towards a very high artistic position there can be no doubt at all, and perhaps the highest praise that can be offered him is to say that he seems the most probable and the most legitimate successor of Verdi, whose "Falstaff" has certainly not been without its influence upon him in his latest work.

In "The Bohemians" there is no set plot, nor, indeed, does Murger's book lend itself well to the making of a plot. It merely presents a series of incidents in the lives of a batch of students of the Quartier Latin in 1830, which may easily be supposed to occur even at the present day, for Rudolph, Marcel, Colline, and Schaunard, respectively poet, painter, philosopher, and musician, are types rather than individual entities. Whether abstemious or prodigal, according to the circumstances of the moment, they are happy in their own ways, living up to their creed that "sufficient for the day" is all they ask or require. They foregather in Marcel's studio, light a fire with a drama by Rudolph, are saved from starvation temporarily by Colline and Schaunard, who have met with some piece of good fortune, and dine sumptuously, for them, in a café. There, in a brilliant scene in the streets surrounding the café on Christmas Eve, is more incident in which the two female characters, Mimi, an embroidress, beloved of Rudolph, and Musetta, a lively lady of the town—types again—are brought into an extremely effective contrast. And so it goes on to the end, an uncommonly pathetic end, to the death of Mimi and the remorse and repentance of the wayward Musetta. But, as was said, there is no plot properly speaking; albeit the scenes are bound together by a thin thread, and one follows naturally enough from the other. The first performance was a singularly good one, despite the serious hoarseness of Mr. Robert Cunningham, who played the important tenor part of Rudolph in evidently great physical discomfort. Mr. William Paull, who sang very finely and acted well as Marcel; Mr. Winckworth, who made a great hit by his fine singing of Colline's song to his old coat in the fourth act; and Mr. Charles Tilbury (Schaunard) were as capable exponents of their parts as could well be desired. Miss Alice Esty has never attained in London the same impressive height as that she reached in Manchester, where her Mimi was not only full of the requisite charm, but also of the utmost pathos in the final scenes; and Miss Bessie Macdonald played Musetta's rôle with excellent vivacity and spirit. She sang, too, with admirable effect, especially in the fine scene introduced by the slow valse, which had to be repeated. Of the remainder of the cast, it is sufficient to say that Mr. Homer Lind doubled the parts of Alcindaro, an infatuated councillor, and Benoit, a landlord, very cleverly. The chorus was, as usual, well up to its work, and the orchestra, under Mr. Jaquinot, was quite unexceptionable, so that there was practically nothing to mar the brilliant success of the performance, which went so smoothly and well that, manifestly, the influence of the composer and Signor Tito Ricordi, who worked like Trojans at the final rehearsals, was for good.

BRIDLINGTON MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

A very remarkable institution in its way is the Bridlington Musical Festival. It shows the power of the zealous and able amateur, for it can be no libel on this little North-East coast watering-place to hold that it would hardly have celebrated its fourth musical festival on the 6th ult. without the active support of Mr. A. W. M. Bosville. And, even had it made such a venture, it is scarcely likely that its ambition would have extended to a programme which, in a single day, would present, among other things, Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride," a couple of new works, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and three Wagner overtures. Mr. Bosville, however, is a gentleman possessing not only musical ability, but insatiable energy, and, what seems indispensable to the permanence of a musical festival carried on under such conditions, the means of supplying the deficiency which must be the result of acting as a musical missionary into musically dark, or, at least dusky, places of the earth. For we are inclined to regard a place that cannot boast of a complete and efficient orchestra as at least in a state of musical twilight, which even a pier band is insufficient to entirely dissipate. As it is, Mr. Bosville has to get together, from all parts of the county, a band of some sixty players, who have, in the course of one day's rehearsal, to scramble as best they may through music of the most advanced description. Under these circumstances, even the most experienced conductor would find it impossible to produce finished performances, and it is no small credit to Mr. Bosville that he got through the two concerts on the festival day, the 6th ult., without mishap. Dvorák's cantata, which is so rich and exacting in its orchestration, was, indeed, particularly well done, and even the warmest admirer of this most beautiful work was able to give himself up to keen and almost uncritical enjoyment.

The presence of two new and "specially composed" works in the programme increased its interest, but one of them suffered for the small opportunity of rehearsal. This was Mr. J. Camidge's "Introduction and three dances," which contained some very charming music, tuneful and with many points of artistic value. But it would be dangerous to attempt to appraise its merits in the light of the performance, which was very imperfect. Finished hurriedly, and rehearsed even more hurriedly—it was even rumoured that, owing to mistakes in the copies, one of a set of variations in the second movement could not be rehearsed at all—it was not surprising if there were several perilous moments. Another time Mr. Camidge would do well to write something simpler and less catchy, unless he is able to stipulate for a double allowance of rehearsal. Mr. J. W. Hudson, the other composer, who appeared to conduct his own work, showed more worldly wisdom. His ballad for contralto and orchestra, a setting of Sir Walter Scott's "Troubadour," proved a straightforward, effective piece, written by a musician who "knows his way about" the orchestra, and thoroughly singable and playable. The solo part was taken by Mrs. Burrell, whose reticent and unaffected singing was most agreeable, though it cannot be said she had the most favourable opportunity for displaying her powers.

The chief choral works were, in addition to "The Spectre's Bride," Mr. Somervell's Leeds cantata, "The Forsaken Merman," which we are glad to see is not being forgotten, for it is, at the lowest estimate, a very thoughtful and graceful work; and Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion," in its British guise as "Praise Jehovah." The principal vocalists were Miss Agnes Nicholls, who entered into the spirit of Dvorák's music with unexpected success; Mrs. Bosville, who sang Thomas's "Swallow Song" very pleasantly; Mrs. Burrell; Mr. Hirwen Jones, a thoroughly "safe" tenor; Mr. Francis Harford, who sang the solo part in "The Forsaken Merman" very ably; and Mr. Albert Archdeacon, who was a spirited Narrator in "The Spectre's Bride." It was in this work that the band, led by Mr. G. Buckley, appeared, on the whole, to the greatest advantage. Mr. Bosville, to judge from his conducting, no less than from the energy with which he manages and carries through the festival, is a man who does nothing by halves. It is constitutional with him to be very much in earnest. This is an excellent failing, but, as a matter of detail, it tends to make his beat less effective than it might be; if he would but take it "by halves" there would be a greater chance for the players to see the whole of it. But this is only an outward and visible sign of an enthusiasm that is not so common that it should be discouraged.

BOURNEMOUTH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

THE Bournemouth musical festival of 1897, which took place on the 5th ult., differed from the festivals of former years inasmuch as a distinct programme had been provided for each concert. The performances were given in the Pavilion of the Winter Gardens, and the executive forces engaged were quite equal to the demands made upon them. They included the following solo vocalists: Miss Anna Williams, Miss Lucie Johnstone, Madame Newling, Mr. Andrew Black, Mr. Braxton Smith, Mr. Bantock Pierpoint, and Mr. Gerald Lee. The orchestra, of which Mr. Dan Godfrey, jun.'s fine band formed the nucleus, was excellent; while the chorus, 250 strong, representing the vocal talent of Bournemouth and the surrounding district, lacked neither training nor enthusiasm.

Unfortunately the afternoon concert attracted only a limited audience—a matter for surprise, considering that the programme included Dr. Parry's "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day" and Tschaïkowsky's "Symphonie Pathétique." Dr. Parry's noble work was given with admirable force and breadth. The chorus was in full sympathy with the music from beginning to end, the result being a splendid effect in the concerted numbers, particularly in the patriotic outburst "But when our country's cause." The solos were well taken by Miss Anna Williams and Mr. Pierpoint. In the Russian master's symphony the capacities of the orchestra found full scope and the performance was a triumph of interpretation, on which both conductor and band are to be heartily complimented. Songs were contributed by Madame Newling, Miss Lucie Johnstone, and Mr. Braxton Smith, and the concert, which opened with the "Tannhäuser" overture, concluded with the march from the same opera.

Gounod's trilogy "The Redemption" filled the programme of the evening concert, at which there was a more satisfactory attendance. The rendering of this impressive work was excellent in every way. The chorus acquitted themselves admirably, especially in the more vigorous numbers, and the solos were safely entrusted to Miss Anna Williams, Madame Newling, Miss Lucie Johnstone, Mr. Braxton Smith, Mr. Bantock Pierpoint, Mr. Gerald Lee, and Mr. Andrew Black, the last-named artist taking the divine words. The orchestral accompaniments approached very nearly to perfection.

Throughout the festival the choral works were conducted by Mr. August Manns, while Mr. Dan Godfrey, jun., took charge of the purely orchestral music. The "Tannhäuser" march was conducted by Mr. Duncan Hume. It only remains to congratulate all concerned upon the success of the festival, which was in no small measure due to the excellence of the arrangements in the hands of a capable and energetic committee.

THE IRISH "FEIS CEOIL."

THIS musical festival was held in Dublin from the 17th to the 22nd ult., and was attended with a measure of success that makes its annual recurrence a highly probable event. The scheme of the competitions and concerts was designed mainly on the lines of the Welsh Eistedfodd All the competitive events of the Feis were filled, and the prizes, amounting to £415, reached every part of the country. Belfast gained the Royal Dublin Society's prize of £50 with the City of Belfast madrigal choir, under Dr. L. Koeller; also Lord Iveagh's prize of £10 with a splendid male-voice choir. Cork carried off the first prize for both large and small school choirs, with SS. Peter and Paul's School and Queenstown Convent School, both directed by Rev. E. Gaynor. Cork also gained the first prize (£20) for brass and reed bands. In Dublin, the choirs trained by Dr. Joseph Smith had a remarkable success, the Rathgar choir taking second prizes and male-voice competitions, and St. Mary's Society taking first prize in female choirs and female quartet, and a special prize was awarded to Mr. Seymour's educational choir of seventy voices, "The Dublin Glee Singers," as typifying one of the chief objects of the Feis. The first Feis concert was of ancient and middle period Irish music, and besides ancient songs in the Irish language and unison chorus with band of harps, included the Irish pipes (played by Mr. Garoghan, of Sligo) and harp (by Mr. Owen Lloyd). A very delightful number was the Irish "Goll" or "Caione," from Bunting's collection, sung by Mrs. Scarff Goodman, and chorus with harps. In the middle and modern periods, Cooke, Rooke, Moore, Stevenson, Mornington, Roche, John Field, and others were represented. At the second concert, on the 19th ult., Dr. J. C. Culwick's prize concert-overture was performed, with John Field's Concerto in A flat (Dr. Laurence Walker, Belfast), Augusta Holmes's symphonic poem "Irlande," and works of Balfe, Stewart, and Robinson, Madame Marie Duma and Mr. Iver McKay being the principal vocalists. The third concert, on the 20th ult., opened with the prize Irish cantata "Deirdre," by Michele Esposito. Performances of Stanford's "Cavalier Songs," and part of his Irish Symphony, Wallace's song "'Tis the harp in the air" and "Lurline" overture concluded the Feis concerts, which were under the excellent direction of Dr. Joseph Smith. On Friday evening the prizes were distributed by the Countess Plunkett. Saturday, the 22nd ult., was devoted to band and instrumental contests, and one most interesting competition in the "finals" calls for notice—namely, Mr. McCall's prize for the discovery of hitherto unpublished Irish music. The presence of the nine Irish pipers and many Irish singers in Dublin was an opportunity not to be lost. A phonograph recorded their tunes for further investigation, and allowed numbers of interested experts to hear them during the day.

MUSICAL COMPETITIONS.

LONDON BOARD SCHOOLS.

A SEVERER test of efficiency than usual was applied on the 11th ult. at the eighth annual vocal music competition of London School Board children, held at Queen's Hall, under the presidency of the Marquis of Londonderry. As the issue of the preliminary contest, six schools were allowed to compete—namely, Munster Road, Fulham; Ancona Road, Plumstead; Monteith Road, North Bow; Fleet Road, Hampstead; Buckingham Terrace, Notting Hill; and Lyndhurst Grove, Camberwell. Victory, signified by possession of the challenge medallion, was gained, not for the first time at these annual gatherings, by Fleet Road (conductor, Mr. J. Harris), and Buckingham Terrace was awarded second place. Each choir had to sing a madrigal, "Our Holiday," by Dr. Warwick Jordan; a sight test by Mr. Roston Bourke; and a piece of its own selection. The judges were Sir John Stainer and Dr. W. G. McNaught, who made their adjudication upon four distinct points—correctness in time and tune, quality of tone and pronunciation of words, preservation of pitch, and expression. It was the opinion both of Sir John Stainer and Dr. McNaught that the pieces chosen were not so suitable as they might have been; indeed, they would like simpler music to be selected.

as population and the like would make any further extension a physical impossibility, yet each meeting has, up to the present, shown a wholesome advance. In the competitions held at the end of April there were several new features, the latest departure being the institution of prizes for song accompaniment at sight. Though this was the first competition of its kind at Kendal, there appeared no fewer than twenty-five competitors, nineteen of them ladies, the prizes going to Miss Armitage, of Stainton; Mr. Thomas, of Sedbergh; Miss Harrison, of Barbon; and Miss L. Germain, of Leasgill. No less than sixteen women's choirs appeared to sing Schumann's "Nänie," the first prize going to Staveley; Burneside and Windermere tying for second, and Sedbergh and Kirkby Stephen for the third, a remarkably close and interesting competition. The male-voice choirs sang Sullivan's "Beleaguered"; Windermere, Sedbergh, and Kirkby Stephen being the prize winners. In a choral competition, limited in scope in order to afford the smaller villages a chance, there were some wonderfully good performances, considering the material available in sparsely populated districts. Endmoor was first, Silverdale second, and Arnside a very good third. Eleven choral societies from the larger villages of the district essayed Mendelssohn's "He, watching over Israel," and this competition was made the more searching and valuable by a sight test given in conjunction with it. For singing the set piece the prizes went to Windermere, Sedbergh, and Yealand, while for sight reading, Sedbergh secured a full number of marks, Crosscrake and Grange being second and third. The "Henry Leslie" challenge shield, for madrigal singing, which may be regarded as the blue ribbon of the meeting, was competed for by twelve choirs, who sang Beale's "Come, let us join the roundelay." Kirkby Stephen was placed first, Staveley and Sedbergh winning the second and third prizes. The "Novice" competition, for choirs of female voices whose members had not previously taken part in these festivals, resulted in some remarkably even singing, and in the end four prizes were given instead of the three announced. Yealand, Sedbergh, Kendal Evening Home, and Crossthwaite were the successful ones. It will have been noticed how prominent Sedbergh was throughout the day, and two more of its successes have to be chronicled; Mrs. Bagot's prize for enunciation and the "Novello" prize for the largest number of marks obtained by any society going to this little town.

The remaining contests may be summed up still more briefly. These were the usual competitions for soprano, contralto, tenor, and bass vocalists. The ladies' merits were adjudicated upon by Miss Lucy Broadwood, who was joined by Dr. McNaught when the turn of the men came. Dr. McNaught, it may here be mentioned, was the principal judge throughout the proceedings, Mr. Henry Bird appropriately enough appraising the competitors for the accompaniment prizes, and Sir John Stainer taking part in deciding the comparative merits of the instrumentalists. These last were divided into string quartets, pianoforte trios, solo violoncellists, and village orchestras. The test piece for the orchestras was a Boccherini minuet, which was played by four sets of performers, the prizes being awarded to Kendal, St. Thomas, and Leasgill. This is one of the most interesting of all the series of competitions, and opens up a delightful vista of possibilities. If, however, it should do nothing more than increase the interest felt in orchestral music, it will have done an excellent work.

According to custom, the first day was given up to the children, who competed in choirs of boys and girls and of boys only, for sight-singing and solo singing. Here, again, the entries showed a healthy growth, numbering sixty, as compared with fifty-one a year ago. In the solo sight-singing, Harold and Marcus Webster, two members of a family who have on several previous occasions shown a marvellous aptitude in this competition, were again successful. On this occasion they chose the staff notation division of the competition, in which there were four candidates. Just three times as many entered for the tonic sol-fa branch, and here again a Webster was the victor, though whether Mabel was of the same clan as Harold and Marcus we know not. The children's day ended with a concert, in which Roeckel's tuneful little cantata "The Hours" and Facer's action song "The Wasp" were sung by the combined children's choirs, under Miss Wakefield's conductorship.

The other two concerts, also conducted by Miss Wakefield, were of course of a more elaborate nature. On the Wednesday, Mr. Somervell's choral setting of "The Charge of the Light Brigade" was sung with great spirit, and was loudly encored; Bach's cantata "A stronghold sure," and a loyal chorus, "Queen of the sixty years," written by Miss Wakefield, were given. On the Thursday a still more ambitious flight was attempted, Dr. C. H. H. Parry's fine ode "Invocation to Music" forming the chief part of the programme. The soloists on these occasions were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Wakefield, Mr. William Green, and Mr. Douglas Powell. Not the least interesting feature of these concerts was to be found in the genial speeches of Sir John Stainer, who gave away the prizes, and with them offered some excellent advice to the competitors, who are all the better for being occasionally reminded of such facts as that competition, though it may be the soul of business, is not by any means the end of art.

A full report of these speeches will be found in the current number of The School Music Review.

LEEDS.

The choral competition that took place at Leeds on the 1st ult. was the third annual contest promoted by the Leeds Prize Musical Union, but in more than one respect it showed a very satisfactory advance upon former years. Profiting by experience, the general arrangements were better, and there was no hitch or loss of time in the proceedings. That this was so may in no small degree be attributed to the fact that the committee had secured as judge a specialist like Dr. McNaught, who has reduced the art of judging to a system. A feature in the programme that was especially to be commended was the inclusion, for the first time, of a sight reading contest. There were five entries, and four choirs appeared, the first prize going to the Reedyford Wesleyan Choir, who went through the first test almost without a fault, and with a fair attention to the nuances of expression, and made a gallant attempt at the second, an unpublished part-song by Dr. C. H. H. Parry. The Ossett Prize Vocal Union was a very good second. This sight reading is a very wholesome ordeal, and it is much to be hoped that in course of time it may be made an essential adjunct to the more important competitions, as is the case at Kendal.

The other contests resulted in some extraordinarily fine singing, the worst fault that could be imputed to the choirs as a whole being a not unnatural tendency, in their eagerness to make the most of every point, to over-accentuation and exaggeration. Each choir sang a set piece, and, after these had been heard, four in each of the two classes (male voices and mixed) were selected by the judge to enter upon a second stage of the competition, and sing pieces of their own choice. There were thirteen male-voice choirs, the prizes going to the Armley Choral Society, the Middlesbrough Apollo Choir, and the Nelson Excelsior Glee Union. In the mixed-voice section eight choirs appeared, and here again the Armley Society secured the first place, the second prize going to the Ossett Vocal Union, and the third to the Batley Vocal Union. In the former competition there were two test pieces, which made the judge's task the more difficult, though it helped to dissipate any monotony the audience might have felt; and in the latter the choirs sang Mr. Eaton Faning's "Shepherd's waking," which was not only the most distinguished and interesting composition sung during the day, but by its exceptional difficulty proved a very searching test. By way of giving variety to the proceedings and making use of the fine material at hand, the combined choirs were heard together, under the conductorship of Mr. A. H. Ashworth, of the Leeds Musical Union, with an effect which, so far as volume and grandeur of tone were concerned, could only be described as superb.

MADRESFIELD.

The musical competitions inaugurated last year at Madresfield, near Malvern, were repeated on the 1st ult., when 700 competitors from forty parishes entered their names in the various classes. The proceedings commenced with part-singing for school children, the first prize being awarded to the choir from Bushley, which also secured the first prize for an action song. Miss Hilda Vaughan obtained the maximum marks in the sight reading competition for children under fifteen, the second place being secured by Miss E. James. In the afternoon, the first prize for the best accompanist at sight was awarded to Miss Keppel Smith and Mr. Ernest Coombes, the second place being gained by Mr. W. Norbury and Miss M. Martin. The remainder of the time was devoted to choral competitions, the following awards being made:—Hymn singing: first prize, the Wyche choir (organist, Mr. J. Sanderson); second prize, Poolbrook (organist, Mr. G. H. T. Foster); third prize, Bushley (organist, Mr. Nash). Gregorian chanting in unison: first prize, Madresfield Church (organist, Mr. Ernest Coombes); second prize, Chapel choir of Madresfield Court (accompanied by Lady Mary Lygon). Anglican chant singing: first prize, the Wyche choir; second, Poolbrook choir. Part-song singing for village choirs—Bishop's "Where art thou, beam of light": first prize, Suckley (conducted by Mr. H. H. Dangerfield). Madrigal competition for choral societies—test piece, Pearsall's "Nymphs are sporting": first place, Miss Fitton's choir; second, Miss A. Munn's choir. The adjudicators were the Hon. Spencer Lyttelton, Mr. Lionel Benson, and Mr. Arthur Somervell. The performances and singing showed a distinct advance since last year, the average standard attained was decidedly higher, and there can be little doubt that these competitions have had a most stimulating effect on the progress of music in the neighbourhood.

In the evening a concert was given in the Assembly Rooms, and Lady Mary Lygon conducted an excellent rendering of Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, "As the hart pants."

Morecambe.

The annual competitions held in this attractive sea-side resort are becoming increasingly important. Hitherto one day has served for the event, but this year it was necessary to arrange for two days—viz., the 7th and 8th ult. The first day's proceedings were confined to local resources, and served to show that Morecambe and its immediate neighbourhood has plenty of musical force. The church choirs did not rise to the occasion—only one in each class came—but in the other classes for sight reading, village school choirs, female voice choirs, male voice quartets, and mixed voice choirs, there were numerous entries. The prizes were gained by the Crosscrake school choir, Barton coming second; the Hornby female voice choir (Mr. Illidge), Yealand (Mr. Whittaker) coming second; the Morecambe male-voice choir, Preston coming second; the Hornby mixed voice choir, Yealand, again coming second. There were also solo singing competitions for sopranos, altos, tenors, and basses, the practice for which should do much to raise the standard of amateur singing in the district. On the evening of the first day a concert was given by the united adult choirs, and the winning choirs performed separately. The Mayor of Lancaster (Mr. N. W. Helme) distributed the prizes and made a really excellent speech upon English music, and he spoke of the indebtedness of the promoters to the efforts of Miss Wakefield. The second day's proceedings pitted local efforts against all-comers. There were sections for instrumental quartets, female voice choirs, male voice choirs, sight reading, and mixed voice choirs. There were some very close contests. Miss Cassidy's quartet was an easy first in the instrumental section; Morecambe came first in the female voice competition, Reedyford making a close second. The other choirs had two "heats" to run. The best in each section were selected at the afternoon contest to compete with another test piece at the evening meeting. The result in the end was that Blackburn gained the first prize of ten guineas, Saltaire, Morecambe, and Reedyford coming next in order. The decision was loudly applauded. In the male-voice section there were some excellent performances, and Morecambe came out first, Manchester coming next. A miscellaneous concert was given, one of the numbers of which was "By Babylon's wave" (Gounod), which was very finely sung by the united choirs. Madame Hope Glenn contributed some songs. Dr. McNaught adjudicated the competition and conducted the concerts. The secretary, Mr. J. W. Aldous, a Lancaster professor of music, deserved the highest credit for the excellence of the arrangements.

Carlisle.

The second annual music competition for Carlisle and district was held in the Drill Hall on the 6th ult. A great advance was made upon the first year's entries, and the festival seems now to be established on a firm footing. There were on this occasion fifty-seven entries as against eighteen last year. In the junior day school section the Fawcett school was the first, not only in performance of set music, but in the two-part sight singing, which was perfectly read. Caldewgate gained the Sunday school choir prize, and the Stanwix girls' school carried off the rural school prize. The Scotby choir came first in the rural choir section, and a party from Annan, under Miss Meikle, gained the vocal quartet prize.

In the female voice choir section the Annan choir, again under Miss Meikle, gained the first place, the Charlotte Street quartet gained the men's voice prize, and a choir from the same quarter also achieved the first distinction in the church and chapel choir section. A very fine performance of Goss's anthem "O Saviour of the World" placed the St. Cuthbert's choir (Mr. W. H. Read) in the first place in the church choir (men and boys) section. In the choral society section the Charlotte Street organisation was again successful, the Annan choir coming second, and the Greystoke choir, under Lady Mabel Howard, coming third. There was some excellent four-part sight singing, in which Annan came first and St. Cuthbert's second.

In the evening a concert was given by the united adult choirs. The programme included "The Queen's Song" (Faning), "Allen-a-Dale" (Pearsall), which was encored; "Good night" (Smart), and "By Babylon's wave" (Gounod). A small and thoroughly efficient band, gathered by Miss Goodwin, played the accompaniments and performed several pieces. At the competition and at the concert the services of Miss Fell, of Ulverston, were invaluable. Miss Meikle and Mr. Bertwistle sang songs acceptably. Dr. McNaught adjudicated at the competition and conducted the concert.

The festival is managed by a committee, who spared no pains to make the undertaking a success. The secretary, Mr. David Hodgson, is an indefatigable worker, and deserved all the great credit he was awarded in the speeches made at the prize distribution, which was undertaken by Mrs. Irwin, in the absence of the Bishop of Carlisle.

MUSIC TEACHING IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

Deputation to Sir John Gorst.

In accordance with the resolution which was unanimously adopted at the conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians at Cardiff in January last, a deputation of members of the musical profession waited upon Sir John Gorst, Vice-President of the Education Department (who was accompanied by Sir John Stainer and Dr. W. G. McNaught), on the 24th ult., to urge upon him "that the recommendation which the Education Department have already issued to the effect that singing should be taught from the staff notation be now acted upon, and that such teaching be rendered compulsory in the higher standards."

The deputation included Sir Alexander C. Mackenzie, Dr. Hubert Parry, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Professor E. Prout, Professor Bridge, Dr. A. H. Mann, Mr. Walter Hately, Mr. Chadfield, general secretary of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, and many others.

The deputation having been introduced by Mr. J. W. Sidebotham, M.P., Mr. W. H. Cummings, in the course of his remarks, said: "The State is devoting a very large sum of money to the teaching of music in the Board and training schools of the country, and we believe that the results obtained are not at all commensurate with that large expenditure. We consider that the horizontal or letter notation taught in the schools, generally known as tonic sol-fa notation, is the great stumbling-block to the advance of students of national music. It is defective in many of its technical details, and has the additional disadvantage, even when thoroughly learned, of leaving the student in absolute ignorance of the one universal music-language—namely, music written in the common staff notation; and though it is affirmed by some of the advocates of the letter, or tonic sol-fa notation, that its principles can be easily applied and transferred to the staff notation, statistics show that this is not done. On the contrary, the relative proportion of scholars in the schools who read the staff notation, as compared with those who use the letter notation, is diminishing at an alarming rate. The returns of the Education Department for 1896 proves that in the schools only eight per cent. in England and three per cent. in Scotland are able to sing from the staff. It might perhaps be argued that this very fact proves the superiority of the tonic sol-fa notation, but that is not so. The true reason why the staff is not taught is that the teachers, from no fault of their own, but from their deficient training, are themselves ignorant of the staff, its value and simplicity, and are therefore unable to teach it. The tonic sol-fa has had a long trial and an amount of patronage bestowed upon it which have virtually excluded the staff notation from the schools, and as a whole it has undoubtedly failed to make the scholars sight singers."

After quoting statistics in support of his contention, Mr. Cummings concluded in these words: "We submit these points to you, Sir, fully assured that they will have a patient and kindly consideration, and that in your wisdom you will be able to suggest means for directing the musical education of the country into a true and healthy groove. We make no suggestion of compulsion; we are only earnest in the cause of music, the art which we love and profess, and which, moreover, we believe to be the art that most truly tests the real advance and civilisation of a nation."

Sir Alexander Mackenzie said: "On behalf of the Royal Academy of Music, I am commissioned to say that that body is completely in sympathy with the motives of this deputation, and that the oldest school of music in the country wishes to add its name to the list of those who advocate reform in the system of teaching in the higher standards of the elementary schools." After having stated that it was not the wish of the deputation, or those it represented, in the slightest degree to under-estimate the services of the tonic sol-faists in assisting the spread of vocal music in the country, Sir A. Mackenzie proceeded to state that tonic sol-fa could never be a substitute for the universal staff notation, while for instrumental music it was absolutely useless. He could only compare adepts in the tonic sol-fa system, when introduced to the generality of musical scores, to a company of blind men in a free library.

Dr. Hubert Parry, in acknowledging the extraordinary success which the tonic sol-faists had attained in reading at sight, a result of which they might justly be proud, said that in this country the people had special natural abilities for music. He referred to the most surprising things he had witnessed in recent years at the Royal College of Music, where young people of extraordinary promise in instrumental music had come from the working classes. After all, the tonic sol-fa system was only part and parcel of that awakening. In his (Dr. Parry's) opinion, if the staff notation did not receive the very warmest encouragement that could be reasonably given to it, a very serious responsibility would rest with those who had, as it were, to guide and control the education of the country.

Sir John Gorst (who received the deputation in the unavoidable absence of the Lord President of the Council) replied that the representations which they had placed before him would receive all the attention they so well deserved. "I should be very sorry," he added, "that this deputation should go away from this building without knowing that all the officers, all the persons who are engaged in the education of the people in England, from the Lord President downwards, are deeply conscious of the great importance of music as part of the education of the young. It is not only an intellectual exercise, but it is a moral teaching in the discipline and power of combination which are necessary even to the most simple musical efforts. So far the Committee of the Council in its codes has left this matter entirely to the discretion of the school managers themselves. It makes its musical grant indifferently to the school whose scholars have learned the staff notation or the tonic sol-fa notation; and if it is true, as I have no doubt it is, that the greater number of managers have adopted the tonic sol-fa system, it is I suppose because they find, or they have found, that it is easier to produce elementary results and an elementary knowledge of singing by the one system than by the other. But I don't believe that the proportion is so great as that which was put before us just now by Mr. Cummings. I think he said "eight per cent." I think that eight per cent. is in our returns. I believe in that respect our returns are not reliable." (Laughter.)

After paying a high tribute to the progress of the art of music in this country during recent years, Sir John concluded: "As I have sympathised with you, let me ask you to sympathise with me, and with those who have to preside over the education of the country. We continually have brought before us cases in which no doubt our educational system can be improved. There are, no doubt, things most desirable for the young to learn which we would be only too glad to see taught, and which would undoubtedly produce very much higher results if they could be made part of the education of the country. But we are circumscribed, confined, kept in by the absolute necessity of time. What this nation is trying to do at the present moment is a work which is almost impossible. It is trying to use only the earliest years of childhood for educational purposes; and it is trying in the years up to the age of eleven, for which the school life of the ordinary English child lasts, to give it as good an education as it gets in Germany, Switzerland, or France, where they keep children of thirteen, fourteen, or fifteen years in the schools. We have come to the conclusion that, impracticable as our present system of education may be, and unsatisfactory as may be the development of the various subjects which we touch, it is absolutely impossible to teach anything more than is now taught unless the country will give us the child for a longer period—say, for one or two years longer for its training than we now have at present. And I cannot help thinking that this reform which you have come to urge upon the Educational Department, as well as all other reforms, must wait until we have an opportunity of keeping children longer at school, and so carrying such instruction as they now receive to that desired higher point which persons interested in their education wish to attain. At the same time, there may probably be some way in which encouragement could be given to the teaching of the staff notation. I understand the staff notation is taught in all training colleges. Perhaps that teaching of the staff notation might be further encouraged, and further facility might be given till at least the teachers of schools are capable of teaching staff notation. In regard to any practical suggestions of that kind, I think there is very little doubt that the Lord President of the Committee of the Council of Education will gladly give them every attention."

Mr. Sidebotham thanked Sir John Gorst for the kind and courteous hearing which he had given to the considerations laid before him, and the deputation withdrew.

A verbatim report of the proceedings appears in the June issue of The School Music Review.

REVIEWS.

Musical Illustrations of the Waverley Novels. Dedicated, by permission, to Sir Walter Scott, Bart. By Eliza Flower. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This beautifully engraved volume is a re-issue of the original work, published in 1831 by "Jos. Alfred Novello, No. 67, Frith Street, one door from Soho Square." The late Miss Flower, who was a sister of Mrs. Adams, the authoress of "Nearer, my God, to Thee," is widely known as the composer of "Now pray we for our country." In these "illustrations," fourteen of Scott's lyrics are wedded to appropriate yet simple music. The songs bear evidence of strong dramatic feeling and keen perception of poetic beauty, and many lovers of the great "Wizard of the North" will be glad to make their acquaintance.

Twelve Easy Voluntaries for the Harmonium. By Max Oesten (Op. 196). Second Set. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

These melodious and well-written pieces not only merit the attention of harmonium players, but also of organists. Easiness is often another name for feebleness, but no such charge can be laid to this useful book of voluntaries.

The Bohemians (La Bohème). Romantic Opera in Four Acts. Libretto by Giuseppe Giacosa and Luigi Illica. Music by Giacomo Puccini. English version of Acts I. and II. by W. Grist; of III. and IV. by P. Pinkerton.
[Ricordi.]

Modern Italian operatic composers seem gradually becoming divided into two classes, those who hanker after the blood and thunder style of Mascagni, who owe a large share of their probably ephemeral success to the sensuousness of their music and a more or less new kind of noise; and those who are content to follow the more sober and more artistic methods of Verdi, as represented by his later development from "Aïda" to "Falstaff." To this latter class Puccini certainly would appear to belong, for this, his latest opera, has far more in common with "Falstaff" than with "Cavalleria." He lacks perhaps the strongly marked individuality of Verdi—at any rate, at present—and it is by a combination of virtues rather than by the supreme strength of any one that he has gained a European success. Of course he avoids set numbers, in accordance with modern operatic custom, but he also avoids the Leitmotif; and that which strikes the musician most strongly is his lightness of touch. Bohemian life in the Quartier Latin, or indeed anywhere else, has often its very sordid side, and there is no gainsaying the fact that had Signor Puccini been less of an artist he could have found ample opportunity for emphasising the coarse side of the picture. But from this he has refrained, with wholly satisfactory results. It is no easy matter to pick out any particular passages or scenes for especial notice from an opera, each act of which is in a sense complete in itself. But no doubt the composer's highest achievement is the superb scene in the second act, which depicts the street round the Café Momus on Christmas Eve. The lovely valse sung by Musetta, the varied rhythms of the music sung by the four students, the cries of the hawkers and buyers, and the music of the tattoo combine to make the most remarkable contrast. There is a wealth of pathos, too, in the scene wherein Rudolph and Mimi meet, and again in the death of Mimi, which is intensely dramatic, albeit the simplest means only are employed. Here especially we think Signor Puccini has shown how true are his artistic instincts. The four principal male characters are happy, light hearted, and gay, in sunshine or storm, but a vein of seriousness is perceptible in them. So, too, in the music this vein is ever present, but always unobtrusive. Two more points may be noticed. The one to show again how skilful is the composer in his use of effective contrast—the scene at the barrier in the third act, where Mimi and Rudolph wander out of sight, happy in their peaceful love, while Musetta and Marcel, the other pair of lovers, are hurling epithets of a most uncomplimentary nature at one another. The second, which shows how bold he is in adopting the means that please him best to obtain a desired effect irrespective of all academic laws—the introduction to the second act, which is but a string of consecutive fifths. The effect may be coarse, but it exactly suggests the turmoil of a vast motley crowd of soldiers, servants, boys, girls, students, hawkers, &c. The score is full of melody, and all the dramatic points are made without effort or exaggeration; it is also full of the most vivid contrasts, as we have endeavoured to show. The subject might easily have been vulgarised, but Signor Puccini has treated it with a refinement and restraint which go far to prove him the possessor of the highest artistic instincts.

Tonality and Roots. By Arthur J. Greenish.
[Office of the Organist and Choirmaster.]

This little book is described as "A new and comprehensive method for finding the keys of intervals, triads, melodic phrases, and the roots of discords," and the description may be said to be justified by the system set forth. It is based on the indicative position of the leading note, which, in almost all cases, is the note natural to the scale possessing more sharps or less flats than the scales of the companion notes in the chord or melodic phrase of which the tonality is sought. The principle is ingeniously developed and reduced to a series of formulæ, the application of which is made clear by numerous examples. To well trained musicians the system is of course unnecessary, and the application of the rules will seem a complicated way of arriving at that which could be more satisfactorily and more quickly accomplished by ordinary harmonic analysis; but to students the system will be decidedly helpful, and especially to those who make themselves familiar with the copious and lucid explanations of the reasons upon which the rules are based.

Dr. Tucker, Priest-Musician. By Christopher W. Knauff, M.A.
[New York: A. D. F. Randolph Company.]

Dr. J. Ireland Tucker (1819-1895) was the first rector of the Church of the Holy Cross at Troy, New York, where he laboured unweariedly for fifty-one years. He was not only the introducer, but the one who made popular the Anglican school of church music in America. Himself a musician, he spared no pains to elevate the standard of devotional art throughout the land of his birth. The story of his life—which is of special interest to American musicians—is pleasantly told by the Rev. C. W. Knauff in these pages. Dr. Tucker seems to have initiated the chanting of morning prayer in America, which he did on April 14, 1846, when Tallis's responses were sung "as given in English cathedrals." Mendelssohn's Te Deum and Jubilate in A was introduced into his church so early as December 6, 1848. In 1870 he issued his "Parish Hymnal," which spread his fame throughout the States. In this connection the book before us contains some interesting letters from English musicians upon the remuneration for hymn-tunes, &c. Sir Frederick Ouseley wrote (in 1872): "I am a bad hymn writer; it is by no means my forte." Sir F. Ouseley and the Rev. J. B. Dykes intimated that they were not accustomed to write for money; but they both expressed their willingness to accept payment, the former because he was rebuilding his organ at Tenbury, the latter because he "has a large parish, a family growing up, and is not overburdened with this world's goods, and finds considerable difficulty in making both ends meet." Sir John Stainer wisely returns the words of a hymn because he considers it "unfitted for music owing to the irregular grouping of the lines." The late Dr. Garrett writes: "I receive three guineas for a tune. My contributions to the completed 'Hymns Ancient and Modern,' the 'Quiver,' and other collections have been paid for at this rate." Dr. W. H. Monk, writing to Dr. Tucker on April 7, 1872, said: "You will be interested to know, perhaps, that I am just asked to correct for the press a collection of chants for the Scotch Presbyterian Church—the authorities of which are about, for the first time, to try to introduce the practice [chanting] —not, as some of them think, to succeed in our time." A quarter of a century has now elapsed since this was written, which is far too short a time to affect the "traditions of the Elders" in regard to their dearly beloved version of the metrical Psalms.

The Village Organist. A series of pieces for Church and general use. Edited by J. Stainer and F. Cunningham Woods. Books 1 to 6. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

There can be no question as to the practical utility of this excellent series of organ voluntaries. We have special facilities for knowing that they will supply a real want. There are a number of organists of churches and chapels up and down the country who, while doing admirable work in their several spheres of labour, are as modest in their attainments as they are in regarding their vocation as a handmaid to religion, and not as a vehicle for their own personal display. To all such these books will come as a boon. The names of the editors are a sufficient guarantee of the quality of the contents of each volume. To quote from the preface: "The editors have endeavoured to bring together a collection of pieces which they trust will prove to be at once simple without being uninteresting, and effective where the instrumental resources are limited." Each book contains from six to ten pieces of various lengths, admirably suitable for opening and closing voluntaries. The time occupied in the performance of each is stated in a foot-note, and everything has been done, especially in the important matter of clear printing and good spacing of the notes, to make the pathway of the organist pleasant and smooth. We predict a hearty welcome to this series (which is to be continued) by town as well as country organists.

Barrack-Room Ballads. Words by Rudyard Kipling. Music by Gerard F. Cobb. Third series.
[C. Sheard and Co.]

THOSE vocalists to whom the previous series of these ballads appealed will doubtless welcome the further union of Mr. Kipling's stirring lines with Mr. Cobb's sympathetic music. The present set consists of six songs, "Belts," "The Widow's Party," "Screw Guns," "Gunga Din," "Oonts," and "Snarleyow," and, as in his other settings, Mr. Cobb has well met the essential requirements of directness of musical expression and effective simplicity of accompaniment. Moreover, the music shows that the composer has again caught the wild, exuberant, and reckless spirit which permeates the text, and that he has acquired the power of increasing the dramatic significance of special points.

Richard Wagner's Prose Works. Vol. V. Actors and Singers (Kegan Paul). Mr. W. Ashton Ellis continues his unwearied task of translating the Bayreuth master's prose works. He promises three more volumes, the last of which is to be published in 1899, thus completing the series. Although the book before us bears the generic title "Actors and Singers," the contents are of a more solid and interesting nature than this designation might seem to imply. Of special interest to musicians generally are the essays on "Beethoven" and "The rendering of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony."——John Sebastian Bach, in relation to his work as a church musician and composer. By Sedley Taylor (Cambridge: Macmillan and Bowes). An interesting lecture delivered preparatory to performances of extracts from some of Bach's church cantatas at Cambridge in 1893. Not the least important feature of this daintily got-up little book is its Appendix, containing a list of particular movements from the Church cantatas "exceptionally worthy of study." —— Two Inaugural Addresses on Music. By Sir Herbert Oakeley (Edinburgh: James Thin). The first of these addresses was delivered at the University of Edinburgh in 1866, the second in 1884, by the then Professor of Music, and written in his usual cultured style.——Counterpoint. By A. Livingstone Hirst (W. Reeves). This little book is said to be "a simple and intelligible treatise in catechetical form." It is perhaps the smallest book on counterpoint ever written.—— Rivista Musicale Italiana (Turin: Fratelli Bocca). This excellent quarterly periodical worthily maintains its reputation as a high-class magazine devoted to the art of music. An interesting feature is the summary of foreign musical magazines, including the English. The kindly reference by our Italian contemporary to the articles in THE MUSICAL TIMES we much appreciate.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE principal musical event of last month was the May festival concert, organised by the Birmingham Kyrle Society, on the 6th ult. The programme was provided by the Birmingham Amateur Orchestral Society and Mr. Halford's select choir, the principal pieces being Grieg's dramatic cantata "Olaf Trygvason," Beethoven's Symphony (No. 8) in F, and Wagner's Vorspiel to Act III. of "Lohengrin." The vocalists were Mesdames Nellie Wiseman, Alice Lakin, and Messrs. Harry Burman and Ernest E. Sharpe. The latter, who possesses a deep and sonorous bass voice, made his début here, creating a favourable impression in Handel's "Honour and arms." A feature of the concert was the brilliant violin playing of Miss Nora Clench, an accomplished artist. Mr. George Halford conducted.

The Royal Society of Artists' musical matinées have become quite an institution in the city, and have been the medium of introducing a number of young vocalists and instrumentalists who otherwise would have found it difficult to make a public début under such favourable conditions.

The last concert of the third series of the St. James's Choral Society, Handsworth, was held on the 11th ult. The programme opened with the National Anthem, followed by Barnby's "Rebekah," the solos in which were taken by Miss Mabel Grove, Mr. J. T. Birch, and Mr. H. Sims. The second part included solos and part-songs and Gade's "Spring's Message." Miss Cleobury ably supplied the pianoforte accompaniment, Mr. B. Nock presided at the harmonium, and Mr. Richard Richards conducted.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE last concert of the season given by the Bristol Choral Society took place on the 1st ult. In memory of Brahms, who had passed away after the date of the concert had been fixed, the choir sang the beautiful number "Behold, all flesh is as the grass," from the master's "German" Requiem. The overture and the second and third acts of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" were splendidly interpreted, the slips on the part of the choir of 600 voices being few. The principal vocalists were Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Jessie King, Mr. Hirwen Jones, Mr. Andrew Black, and Mr. Montague Worlock, who discharged their duties with every satisfaction. Probably the finest performance of Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" ever given in Bristol succeeded that of Wagner's work. The delightful choruses were sung with wonderful strength, precision, and clearness, and the instrumental sections were admirably played. Mr. George Riseley conducted.

Bristol North Musical Society gave a concert on April 28, when part-songs were sung, under the direction of Mr. F. Nash.

Bishopston Choral Society sang Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" and several numbers from Haydn's "Creation" in the Church, on April 28, to the accompaniment of organ and band, the soloists being Miss Jessie Sweet and Mr. Walker. The Allegretto movement from Mendelssohn's symphony to the "Hymn of Praise" was played as a concluding voluntary. Mr. Westcott conducted.

The Cecilian Choral Society, the conductorship of which has passed from the late Dr. Cunningham to Mr. W. J. Kidner, gave a pleasing performance of Dr. E. F. Rimbault's cantata "Country Life," and tastefully sang a number of part-songs on the 5th ult. Miss Marion Harris, Miss Laura Lewton, Mr. W. D. Merrell, and Mr. J. W. Davey were the principal vocalists.

On the 11th ult. St. Mary's (Tyndall's Park) Choral Society gave a concert at the Redland Park Hall, when Gade's "Spring's Message" and Lloyd's "Hero and Leander" were rendered.

Vocal and instrumental pieces filled the programme of the Clifton Pompadour Musical Society at its concert on the 18th ult. Interest centred in a new cantata, "May morning," for ladies' voices, written by Mr. W. Fear Dyer, a local musician, which was favourably received. Madame Probert Goodwin conducted.

A pleasing performance of "H.M.S. Pinafore" was given by children at All Saints' Hall, Clifton, on April 21 and 22; and on the 12th, 13th, 14th, and 15th ult. the Bristol Amateur Operatic Society, a talented company of players and singers, gave enjoyable representations of "The Gondoliers," under the direction of Mr. Bruce Bedells, at the Alexandra Hall.

The fusion of the Bristol Musical Festival Society and the Bristol Choral Society, or a working agreement between them, to accomplish which negotiations have been long pending, is not yet quite effected. A meeting of guarantors and subscribers was held on the 19th ult., when progress was reported, instructions were given that negotiations should be continued, and the meeting was further adjourned.

Weston-super-Mare Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Gluck's "Orpheus," on the 6th ult., under the direction of Mr. Edward Cook, and so clearly and intelligently sang the melodious music with which the opera abounds that it delighted the large assemblage. Miss Lilian Hovey, who sustained the part of Orpheus in the work, gave a splendid exposition of the character, singing the music with rare intelligence and declamatory power. The Misses K. and E. Gerrish satisfactorily filled the minor parts. In commemoration of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee, Handel's coronation anthem, "Zadok the Priest," and a part-song, entitled "The splendour of the reign," by E. A. Dicks, were included in the scheme, the concert terminating with the National Anthem.

Clevedon Philharmonic Society gave a concert on the 12th ult., the chief works being Dr. Lloyd's tuneful "Hero and Leander" and Somervell's "The Forsaken Merman," which were performed in a praiseworthy manner. The principal vocalists were Miss K. Gerrish, Miss Ethel Button, Mr. A. E. Masters, and Captain Trestrail. The concert concluded with Dicks' part-song "The splendour of the reign" and "God save the Queen."

Mid-Somerset Ladies' Orchestral Society gave a successful concert on April 22 at Midsomer Norton.

Part-songs and glees and a few instrumental pieces filled the programme of the Radstock Choral Society's concert on April 26.

Stanford's "Phaudrig Crohoore" was performed by the Bridgwater Choral Society, under the guidance of Mr. Herbert Parsons, on April 22; and the Orchestral Society of the same town gave a successful concert on the 13th ult.

Familiar glees and part-songs were sung by Keynsham Choral Society on April 26.

Chard Harmonic Society produced a new Requiem in A minor and brought forward Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" on April 29.

Chipping Sodbury Choral Society gave exceptionally good interpretations of Gaul's "Holy City" and Bennett's "May Queen" on the 5th ult., under the direction of the Rev. E. B. Bradley. Mrs. R. E. Neville, Miss McDougall, Miss Clara Aldersley, Mr. C. E. Morgan, the Rev. Dr. Saunders, and Mr. W. Thomas were the soloists.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

With the assistance of the Festival Choir and the Norwich Philharmonic Society, Dr. Bunnett's Saturday evening organ recitals, given in St. Andrew's Hall, were brought to a brilliant termination on April 24. The programme included selections from "Elijah" and "The Messiah," Handel's Organ Concerto (No. 2), with orchestral accompaniment, Dr. Bunnett's "Victoria," composed for Her Majesty's Jubilee in 1887, &c.

The annual concert given by the choristers connected with Norwich Cathedral took place on April 27, under the careful superintendence of Dr. Bates, the Cathedral organist. A well-chosen selection of glees, madrigals, and part-songs was charmingly sung, much to the enjoyment of an audience which filled St. Andrew's Hall. Wilbye, Morley, Boyce, Blumenthal, Parry, Caldicott, Mendelssohn, Gounod, Eaton Faning, and Mackenzie were all drawn upon, so that the scope of the programme was very catholic. Special mention should be made of Blumenthal's "Gather ye rosebuds," which was beautifully sung; also of Gounod's "Bright star of eve" and Eaton Faning's "The Queen's Song." A pleasing variety was introduced by Madame Van Eyk, who played two movements from Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata (Op. 53) with consummate taste and judgment.

The Norwich Orchestral Union, conducted by Mr. Ernest Harcourt, gave its ninth concert on April 29, when both the band and chorus showed marked signs of improvement upon previous efforts. Mendelssohn's "Loreley" was the chief work, Miss Gommersall taking the solos with commendable care. Here and there the band was a little faulty, but any shortcomings were amply atoned for in the same composer's "Trumpet" overture, which was played with considerable spirit. A feature was the introduction of a violoncello solo, "An Autumn Song," written by Mr. E. Harcourt, and brilliantly played by Herr Rudersdorff. This melodious and clever composition was played for the first time at a concert given by the Musical Artists' Society in London last year, but not heard in Norwich till this concert.

The Norwich "Gate House" Choir made its fifty-second public appearance on the 7th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Kingston Rudd. Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" and Handel's coronation anthem, "My heart is inditing," were sung, the solo in the hymn being taken by Mrs. E. Nuthall, while the soloists in the anthem were Miss Stannard, Miss A. White, Miss J. Woodrow, Mr. S. H. Burton, and Mr. A. T. Springall, all members of the society. Mr. Ferdinand Weist-Hill was highly successful in several violin solos. This artist joined Mr. Rudd in Beethoven's Pianoforte and Violin Sonata in A minor (Op. 23), a very charming performance resulting. Mr. Rudd also gave a delightful interpretation of a prelude by Liszt and Chopin's Nocturne (Op. 15, No. 2).

The programme of the concert organised by Dr. Cooper Pattin consisted mainly of chamber music, and included Dvorák's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in F, played by the Misses Florence and Ethel White; Saint-Saëns's Violoncello and Pianoforte Sonata, with the Rev. Boyton Smith and Miss Ethel White as executants, the same ladies and gentleman giving a capital rendering of Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor.

The veteran Norwich Philharmonic Society quite sustained its reputation by the way the various works contained in the programme of its ninety-third concert were performed on the 12th ult. Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony was very creditably played. Cowen's "Four Dances in the Olden Style" were also delicately given, and proved very acceptable. The concert opened with Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture, and closed with that to "Tancredi." Miss Maggie Purvis and Mr. Sawford Dye contributed songs. Dr. Hill conducted with his usual care, and Mr. F. W. B. Noverre occupied his usual post at the leader's desk.

An interesting concert was given by the King's Lynn Musical Society on April 23, conducted by Mr. A. H. Cross. The first part consisted of a selection of works by Mendelssohn, in which the band and chorus were engaged, Miss Ballard taking the solos. The most important feature in the second part were two violin solos, charmingly played by Miss Mary Noverre.

The Beccles Choral Society gave a concert on April 26, the proceeds being devoted to the Jubilee Celebration Fund. Hiller's "Song of Victory" was the work chosen, and both band and chorus acquitted themselves with credit; the solos were sung by Miss Marion Tilney. The band was led by Mr. W. E. Tuddenham, and Mr. W. W. Harvey conducted.

The Diss Choral Society closed its season on the 6th ult. with a miscellaneous concert, conducted by Mr. T. M. Pullen. Miss Edith Serpell and Mr. Charles Butler supplied the principal vocal pieces. Miss Florence Abbott, a local resident, played several violin solos in capital style, and Serjeant Luck's clarinet solo gave general satisfaction. Further instrumental numbers were contributed by Miss Amy Winter (pianoforte) and Mr. G. C. Pywell (violoncello).

The East Dereham Choral Society, which has been suspended for several seasons, gave signs of life again on the 6th ult., when, under the guidance of Mr. C. Carte Doorly, the choir attempted Mendelssohn's "Loreley," Handel's "Zadok the Priest," and several part-songs with fair success. In addition to singing the solo portions of "Loreley," Miss Gommersall was heard in two or three songs with evident pleasure. Miss Evelyn Ray, Mrs. Gray, and Mr. C. Copeman contributed vocal selections, and Miss Brodhurst-Hill played two violin solos in good style.

The third concert of the Lowestoft Musical Union took place on the 11th ult., Bennett's "May Queen" filling the first half of the programme. The soloists were Miss Blanche Powell, Mrs. H. D. Flowers, Mr. Sawford Dye, and Mr. J. H. Brockbank, whose singing was all that could be desired. A capable string orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. A. S. Coote Suggit, gave a good account of the accompaniments, Mr. E. W. Tuttle being at the organ. Good training was evident from the way in which the choruses were sung, and Mr. H. D. Flowers, who conducted, deserves congratulation.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

There is little to chronicle this month of our saison mort. A very catholic scheme of six organ recitals, at St. Giles's Cathedral, by Mr. John Hartley; the half-yearly visit of the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company; and three Beethoven trio concerts, organised by Mr. Denhof, practically exhaust the list. Mr. Denhof was assisted by Messrs. Sons and Kosman in the violin part, and by Messrs. Hochstein and Benda in the violoncello part of the Trios (Op. 1, 11, 70, 97), and fragments. Mr. A. B. Bach, Miss Gordon Pillans, and Miss May Gibb lent variety to the programmes by singing several Beethoven songs.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

The annual meeting of the proprietors of the Philharmonic Society took place on the 10th ult., under the presidency of Mr. W. C. Clark, who, it will be recollected, when previously in office, commissioned the writing of Mackenzie's "Dream of Jubal," the only original work produced by the Liverpool premier society within present memory. The statement of accounts showed a considerable falling off in the balance to credit as compared with that of last year; but this is to be accounted for by exceptional payments to artists and the cost of alterations effected in the Philharmonic Hall. The marvellous machine which has for too many years done duty as organ was truly designated by Mr. Arthur Earle as a "miserable instrument," and it was suggested that a new one should be erected. Instead of doing this, however, at an assumed cost of £2,000 or £2,500, the chairman explained that the present organ could be made "perfectly good" (which will be news to some experts) for £250 or £300. The usual votes of thanks were passed to the conductor, Mr. F. H. Cowen, and the choirmaster, Mr. A. H. Branscombe. It was resolved that, as usual, twelve concerts be given next season.

Too late for notice last month was the annual Psalmody demonstration of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, which took place on April 27 at Hengler's Circus. This is always one of the most important choral gatherings of the year, and on this occasion the amalgamated choirs numbered about 1,500 voices, mainly recruited from Bootle, Birkenhead, Seacombe, Rock Ferry, New Brighton, Southport, Garston, and other places in the district, as well as from the city itself. Mr. J. T. Rees conducted, and the programme consisted mainly of hymns and anthems.

The Wirral Amateur Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Schiever, gave its fifteenth annual concert in the Town Hall, Birkenhead, on the 5th ult., the main feature of the performance being, as usual, the admirable playing of this exceptionally good body of string performers.

People of all sorts and conditions flocked to the new Empire Theatre during the early days of May to hear Mr. Sims Reeves. By some of the younger folk of the present age, who knew of the great tenor only as a historic name, disappointment was expressed. With those who knew the famous artist of old, and with such as were able to appreciate excellence of method, it was very different. For there was strong evidence of that marvellously resonant tone and that perfection of production which, despite those mannerisms which still exist, during half-a-century or so kept Sims Reeves in the foremost place among the tenor vocalists of this or any other country. And with the lapse of even so many years as his career has witnessed, the signs of the wear and tear of time were but few and far between.

The death of Mr. W. T. Best is noticed in another column.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

We may, with a double pleasure, look back upon the past winter which, both artistically and financially, has in its more important undertakings been unusually successful. From time to time I have noted the greater point and finish and the all-round excellence of the orchestral performances under Mr. Cowen's direction; and the growing interest of the public has shown a correspondingly liberal appreciation and readiness of response. A like welcome has been given to the recitals of chamber music which Mr. Brodsky, far beyond all precedent here, has popularised. The varied and always excellent selection of works, the refinement of the interpretation, the modest charges which brought so much enjoyment within the reach of all amateurs, and the generosity which prompted the principal of the College of Music to devote all the proceeds to the aid of deserving students combined so to enlist the sympathies of all lovers of music that a very handsome sum has been handed over to the fund which, pending the permanent endowment of scholarships, it is very important to maintain.

Under the direction of Mr. Carl Fuchs, at the Schiller Saloon, the chamber music party, with the able assistance of Mr. Max Mayer at the pianoforte, and of Messrs. H. Smith and J. Nichols, gave, on the 10th ult., a memorial performance of works by the recently deceased master, Johannes Brahms, including the much-revised Trio (Op. 8) and the Sextet in G (Op. 36). The almost uninterruptedly serious strain of the music, combined with the pervading sense of our recent bereavement, cast over the audience a somewhat saddened feeling, which was in no degree lightened by the songs which Fräulein Pfeiffer van Beek selected.

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

The musical season in this district has practically closed. No concerts of any importance have been given in Newcastle-on-Tyne or Sunderland—the two principal centres of musical activity in these counties—during the past month; and the only noteworthy event in the outlying towns was a performance of Dr. C. H. Lloyd's dramatic cantata "Andromeda," on the 10th ult., by the Hexham Choral Society. The soloists were Miss M. Wood, Miss Emily Forster, Mr. Tom Child, and Mr. McConnell Wood, who were perfectly satisfactory in their respective parts. A small orchestra was engaged, under the leadership of Mr. J. H. Beers, and Mr. J. Gibson was the conductor. The cantata obtained a creditable rendering, but the attendance on the part of the public was not such as to make the financial result altogether satisfactory.

The Bishop Auckland Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. N. Kilburn, gave, on April 27, a performance of Elgar's dramatic cantata "King Olaf," the work which created so marked an impression on the occasion of its first performance at the North Staffordshire Festival last year, and also at the Crystal Palace a few weeks ago. The solo vocalists were Miss Maggie Jacques Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. W. Thornton. Mr. J. H. Beers was principal violin and Mr. Walton principal violoncello. In the second part of the programme an Impromptu for violoncello solo and orchestra, by Vernon Addison, was produced with excellent effect.

The Sunderland Philharmonic Society has selected for performance next season Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" and Edward Elgar's "King Olaf."

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The Spring concert of the Amateur Musical Society took place on the 4th ult. Goring Thomas's "The Swan and the Skylark," Mendelssohn's 115th Psalm, and a miscellaneous selection combined to form an attractive programme. Thomas's posthumous work was heard for the first time in Sheffield, and its melodic beauty and the charm of Professor Stanford's orchestration were generally admired. The work received adequate treatment from the members of the chorus, who, under Mr. Schollhammer's direction, sang with admirable finish and accuracy. The soloists were Miss Norledge, Mrs. E. B. Glossop, Mr. A. Dawes, and Mr. J. Lycett. The concert concluded with a spirited rendering of Eaton Faning's "The Queen's Song." Mr. J. Peck led the band, and Mr. J. W. Phillips was organist.

The Brincliffe Orchestral Society terminated another successful season on the 14th ult., with a concert given under the direction of Mr. J. H. Parkes. Mackenzie's "La belle Dame sans Merci," Bennett's "Paradise and the Peri," and Mackenzie's "Pibroch" Concerto, admirably played by the conductor, were the chief pieces in the programme.

Mr. Frederick Dawson has commenced another series of pianoforte recitals in the Montgomery Hall. The first took place on the 12th ult.

The Sheffield Male-Voice Glee and Madrigal Society, formed last year, has been re-organised, with Mr. J. A. Rodgers as conductor.

Music performed on the occasion of Royal processions rarely calls for notice in a musical journal. But the visit of Her Majesty the Queen to Sheffield, on the 21st ult., presented some points of special musical interest inasmuch as one of the most important parts of the function was the performance before Her Majesty of a choir of 50,000 children assembled in the open air on a favourable spot in Norfolk Park. The arrangements for gathering and grouping the children reflected the greatest credit on the organisers; but special mention should be made of the skill by which Dr. Henry Coward contrived with a huge baton to keep the mass together. The programme included patriotic songs and Jubilee hymns, sung, of course, in unison to the accompaniment of half-a-dozen or so judiciously placed bands. The volume of sound was not so impressive as the fact that such a number of executants could be made to sing together with fair unanimity.

MUSIC IN THE SOUTHERN COUNTIES.

The Salisbury Philharmonic Society's concert on April 26 was, musically considered, one of the most successful yet given. Professor Stanford's "Phaudrig Crohoore" was the chief choral work performed, and received a good rendering. The rest of the programme was miscellaneous and was contributed to by Madame Kate Cove, Miss Maud Robertson, Mr. Edward Mason, and Mr. Philip Lewis. A capable orchestra was led by Miss Nellie Harding, and Mr. Alfred Foley and Mr. Charles Fanner conducted.

The first concert of the forty-ninth season of the Sarum Choral Society was given on the 5th ult., when Haydn's oratorio the "Creation" constituted the programme. The solo vocalists were Madame Ada Patterson, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Arthur Barlow. Mr. F. L. Bartlett led the orchestra and Mr. Bowey conducted.

Mr. T. E. Spinney's annual students' concert, on the 11th ult., at Salisbury, passed off very successfully.

The appearance of the Downton Choral Society, on April 24, was a very satisfactory one, upon which the conductor, Mr. J. G. Northover, is to be complimented. Stanford's choral ballad "The Revenge" formed the chief feature of the programme, and the manner of its performance reflected credit on all concerned. Songs were sung by Miss Wrightson, Viscount Folkestone, M.P., Mr. Bowes, and Mr. Collier, and Mr. Burgess contributed a cleverly played cornet solo.

Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" was selected by the Southampton Philharmonic Society for performance at the very successful concert which took place on the 13th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. H. M. Pike. The principals were Miss Alice Simons, Miss Marian Blinkhorn, Mr. Samuel Masters, and Mr. W. H. Burgon. Mr. E. Jones was leader of the orchestra.

The twentieth annual festival of the Western Counties Musical Association was held at the Victoria Hall, Exeter, on April 22, when Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" and Beethoven's "Mount of Olives" were performed at the morning concert. Special interest was excited in Dr. Ferris Tozer's new oratorio "Balaam and Balak," which was produced with much success at the evening concert, under the composer's personal direction, to whom congratulations are due. The vocalists were Miss Mabel Berrey, Miss Kate Redman, Mr. Herbert Grover, and Mr. Daniel Price. Mr. John Pardew was the first violin, Mr. W. L. Barrett the solo flautist, and Mr. E. M. Vinnicombe presided at the organ. The band and chorus, numbering 400 performers, were, with the exception of Dr. Tozer's work, ably conducted by Dr. Wood.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

Easter is always the time when music gives place to cricket in Yorkshire, consequently there is comparatively little to chronicle during the past month.

An event which seems to us to deserve special record, since it affords an instructive example, is a series of concerts that took place in the Yorkshire Dales last month. The apparently insurmountable obstacle to choral performances in rural districts is the obvious difficulty in finding a sufficient number of competent singers. The Hon. Lucien Powlett has, however, found a way out of the difficulty by getting together the nucleus of a chorus at each of three small country towns, Middleham, Bedale, and Richmond, and enlarging it at each place by the addition of contingents from the other two, with the addition of soloists and a few instrumentalists from outside. The outcome of these arrangements was a series of very creditable performances of Handel's "Samson," given at each of the three centres on the 4th, 5th, and 6th ult. respectively. The principals were Miss Ada Beecroft and Miss Amy Sargent (sopranos), Miss Nellie Allaun (contralto), the Rev. W. J. Newton and Mr. T. H. Brearley (tenors), and Messrs. J. H. Bayley and J. Browning (basses). Mr. Rees, of Bradford, was the leader of the little band, which had to be eked out with a harmonium, and Mr. Powlett, who conducted, may be congratulated on the success of an experiment that certainly deserves the sincere flattery of imitation in country districts.

At Scarborough a concert was given on the 18th ult., in which both professional and amateur musicians of the town took part. The programme included movements from pianoforte quintets by Dvorák and Schumann, well played by Mr. and Miss Cass, Mr. Bower, Miss Alderson-Smith, and Mr. Owen Williams, most of whom also contributed solos on their respective instruments.

On the 12th ult. a students' concert was given in the College of Music Concert Hall by those who were successful at the recent competitions for scholarships, prizes, and medals. The programme was repeated on the 14th ult., at Bradford Mechanics' Institute.

Mr. Charles Stott has been appointed organist and accompanist to the Bradford Festival Choral Society.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

Madame Nordica made her appearance at the Opéra on April 28 in "Lohengrin," and met with a favourable reception, somewhat tempered by critical observations regarding her pronunciation. The lady has, however, since relinquished her engagement with the directors. Tamagno's success has been such as to induce the directors to add several representations of "Otello" to those previously advertised, and the distinguished tenor was announced to return once more towards the end of last month for some further performances of Verdi's opera. A new ballet is shortly to be produced here, "l'Etoile," by MM. Wormser, Camille de Roddaz, and Aderer, which will most likely be given in conjunction with a revival of "Thaïs." A reprise of "Les Huguenots" is also expected at no distant date.

At the Opéra Comique Mdlle. Van Zandt achieved a great success recently in "Mignon." Two young singers have just been engaged at this house—viz., Mdlle. Andral, a mezzo-soprano, and Mdlle. Linder, one of the most gifted pupils of Madame Laborde. On the 17th ult. the first performance took place of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," in M. Ch. Nuitter's version of the libretto. The interpretation of the work does not call for any detailed comment, the principal artists engaged in it being Mesdames Marcy and Carré-Delorn; MM. Bouvet, Carbonne, Belhomme, and Jérome.

A concert was given on the 2nd ult., at the Conservatoire, in aid of the monument to be erected to Vieuxtemps, on which occasion M. Marsick scored an enormous success with the fourth concerto by the great violinist, he being also associated with M. Loeb in the interpretation of a duet for violin and violoncello from the same pen.

At the Salle Pleyel, Henri Kartun, a little German pianist, six years of age, made his appearance on April 28, and astonished everyone by his remarkable performances. As a critical writer of the Journal observes, one felt inclined to call the youngster "cher maître," and present him with a baton in the shape of a sugarstick.

MM. Pugno and Ysaye are just now giving a series of four concerts devoted to the sonata for pianoforte and violin, ancient and modern, which are attended by considerable success, both artistic and financial. Amongst other concert performances may be instanced those of M. Guilmant, the distinguished organist, at the Trocadero, with the co-operation of the St. Gervais choir, under the direction of M. Bordes, which have been exceedingly well attended. The same may be said of those given by MM. Marsick and Bauer, in which the excellent violoncellist, M. Salmon, also takes part, and which invariably include two sonatas for pianoforte and violin, and a trio. The concert of the 13th ult. of these artists offered a superb interpretation of the Pianoforte Trio in C minor by Brahms, as well as of the "Kreutzer" Sonata, which resulted in a veritable triumph for MM. Marsick and Bauer. At the festival concert given in aid of the Litolff monument, on April 29, M. Paderewski played the Liszt Concerto in E flat, the Scherzo from the Concerto in D by Litolff, and the F minor Concerto by Chopin in a way which aroused the enthusiasm of the audience, the concert being in other respects also a complete success. M. Joseph Wieniawski, a pianist-composer resident in Brussels, gave a performance here in his double capacity. A former pupil of Marmontel, M. Wieniawski has since developed a distinct individuality, and amongst the works produced from his pen a quartet, and some songs, interpreted by Mdlle. Prozka, met with especial appreciation. Mdlle. Clotilde Kleeberg also gave, as usual every year, several recitals. The programmes of this charming pianist invariably present some less frequently heard works, such as the Fantasia by Henselt, the Toccatina of Paul Lacombe, the Barcarolle of Fauré, and the "Feux follets" of Jensen. Her success was complete.

The orchestra of the Berlin Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Herr Nikisch, gave a series of five concerts here, the success of which has been most marked. The ensemble of this fine body of artists has been greatly and justly admired and applauded. At the same time, it may be said that our own orchestras, of the Conservatoire and of M. Lamoureux, need not fear comparison with it. It was a matter for regret, however, that the works performed by our Berlin visitors were the same which, for the last ten years, have been produced almost ad nauseam at our regular Sunday concerts. One would have been so glad to have heard some less familiar compositions, say of Brahms, Goldmark, Bruch, and others.

Experiments have lately been carried on at the Académie des Sciences with a view of ascertaining the influence exercised upon the human voice by electricity. As the result, Dr. Moutier (assisted by M. Granier, the accompanist at the Conservatoire) has established the fact that the influence is a beneficial one, the voice gaining both in amplitude and timbre, and being rendered less subject to fatigue.

At the second concert of its first season given by the St. Cuthbert's Hall Choral Society, on the 18th ult., at the Hall, Philbeach Gardens, Kensington, Handel's "Acis and Galatea" and Mr. Edward Elgar's ballad for chorus and orchestra "The Banner of St. George," commemorative of Her Majesty's reign, formed the principal numbers of the programme. Handel's familiar serenata received a con amore interpretation on the part of the well-trained choir, the soloists being Miss Amy Sargent, Messrs. Eugène de Danckwardt and Charles Phillips. Mr. Elgar's ballad met with its first performance in England on this occasion. The very fine poem of Mr. Shapcott Wensley has afforded the composer an opportunity for dramatic contrasts and lyrical effects of which he has not failed to avail himself, with the result that in boldness, vigour, and picturesqueness of treatment his score fully rises to the importance of his theme. The work, for its proper appreciation, demands, of course, a fuller orchestra than was available in the present instance; but the choir was assiduous in emphasizing the various special effects intended by the composer—as in the passage "Hark! 'tis the ringing hoof of steed," with its finely contrived dynamic gradations; in "Loud burst the shouts," and throughout the more directly applied commemorative epilogue, and acquitted itself most creditably of a task which was not altogether an easy one. Mr. Cyril Miller, the able and painstaking conductor, merits thanks for having been the first to introduce this interesting and opportune work to the public, and it may be hoped that his example will be followed ere long by other choral bodies.

At a meeting of the Associated Board, held on the 18th ult., Mr. Thomas Threlfall was unanimously elected to fill the office of Chairman, vacant by the death of Lord Charles Bruce, and the Hon. G. Spencer Lyttelton was unanimously elected to that of Deputy-Chairman. Both appointments have received the entire approval of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, the President of the Board. The hon. local representative at Leicester, Mr. J. H. Marshall, who is Mayor of that town, has kindly offered to the Board two gold medals, commemorative of Her Majesty's Diamond Jubilee, to be given to the candidates who obtained the largest number of marks in the senior and junior divisions of the local centre examinations throughout the United Kingdom. The former will be awarded to Miss Gertrude E. Miller, of Pevensey, who has passed a phenomenal examination and obtained absolutely full marks in this grade in pianoforte playing. She is the only candidate this year who has gained this distinction. The junior gold medal will be awarded to Miss M. C. Worth, of Plymouth, who has obtained the very large number of 147 out of a possible 150 in pianoforte playing, and also 125 marks in violin playing.

Miss Mabel Buckler, Miss Mary Thynne, and Mr. Arthur Boyle provided an agreeably diversified programme at Steinway Hall on the 18th ult. The first-named young artist's excellent soprano voice and refined manner enabled her to gain distinction in Grieg's setting of "Solvejg's Song" and Délibes' "Les Filles de Cadiz." Miss Mary Thynne displayed exceptional gifts as vocalist and violinist. She did the amplest justice to Filippi's "Melodia" and Tosti's "Si tu le voulais," each of which demands style and close observance of expression; and as instrumentalist she won equally merited approval, the favourable opinion gained by fluent execution of her share of Gade's Duo Sonata (No. 2, Op. 21), with Master Basil Gauntlett as her companion, being fully endorsed later. Mr. Arthur Boyle sang Brahms's "Sind es schmerzen," and other high-class songs very sympathetically, and Miss Ellen Bowick recited "Fair Helen" and "Young Lochinvar" with Mr. Stanley Hawley's pianoforte accompaniment.

Mr. George A. Clinton's second chamber concert this season, held on the 7th ult., in Queen's (Small) Hall, included a couple of works not often heard and a composition new to the metropolis. Ludwig Thuille's Sextet in B flat (Op. 6) for pianoforte, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon evoked considerable interest, and the third movement (gavotte and trio) was so ably rendered by Miss Adela Verne, MM. Fransella, Malsch, Clinton, Borsdorf, and T. Wotton that repetition was insisted upon. In Rheinberger's Nonetto in E flat (Op. 39) these artists (the pianist excepted) had for companions Miss Jessie Grimson (violin), Mr. Hobday (viola), Mr. Melling (violoncello), and Mr. Winterbottom (double-bass). The novelty, Klughardt's "Schilflieder" (Op. 28) for pianoforte, oboe, and viola, is a tasteful composition rather lacking in variety. Miss Louise Phillips agreeably interspersed the instrumental works with songs, being specially successful with examples of Grieg.

Mr. Cyde Twelvetrees, who gave his first violoncello recital on the 7th ult., at the Steinway Hall, imparted much interest to his programme by including in it Edouard Lalo's Concerto in D for violoncello and orchestra, which had not previously been heard in London. Unfortunately no provision, beyond that of a pianoforte, had been made for the orchestral portion of the work, and it was therefore impossible to acquire more than a general idea of the music. The first number of the three would appear to be the most important, and the solo portion, which is well laid out for the violoncello, comprises much pleasing music. Mr. Twelvetrees produced a good quality of tone from his instrument, over which he has acquired great executive command, his style, moreover, is unaffected and refined. He was very ably assisted at the pianoforte by Miss Ada Walters, who also rendered some pianoforte pieces in a sympathetic manner, and Mdlle. Aimée Ferdinand contributed some songs.

THE Tonic Sol-fa College held its annual meeting on the 17th ult., at Queen's Hall, under the presidency of Mr. Andrew Ashcroft (in the absence of Sir A. K. Rollit, M.P.), who compared the condition of music at the Queen's Accession with that of to-day. Since sixty years ago, when, he asserted, the cultivation of music in this country had sunk to a low point, a vast improvement in taste had taken place. Mr. J. Spencer Curwen was also among the speakers. In the course of the proceedings the South London Choral Association and the West London Choral Association sang several part-songs and glees by Gaul, Webbe, and Caldicott in a praiseworthy manner, and the two choirs combined gave capital performances of Myles B. Foster's patriotic piece "The Queen—God bless her!" and Mendelssohn's "Festgesang." There was also a demonstration of sight singing, &c., by a juvenile choir from the Beethoven Street Board School.

THE South-West London Choral Society, a recently formed institution, under the conductorship of Mr. Richard Lemare, precentor of the Royal Military Chapel, gave its first concert on the 5th ult., at the Town Hall, Battersea. The choir is, as yet, but a small one, but it contains some good material, and, with the aid of so able and energetic a conductor, will doubtless, ere long, be trained into a thoroughly efficient body. The works produced on this occasion were Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion," Gounod's "O sing to God," and Cowen's "Rose Maiden," Mesdames Esther Palliser and Eliza Thomas, Messrs. Iver McKay and R. E. Miles taking the solo parts. Messrs. Henry Bird (pianoforte) and F. P. Parker (organ) were the able accompanists. The audience testified, both by its numbers and the applause bestowed upon the performance, to the interest taken in the new society in a locality where it evidently supplies a want.

MR. GRANVILLE BANTOCK is to be commended for giving, on the 11th ult., a "British composer's chamber concert" at the Steinway Hall. Mr. Bantock was only represented by a set of lyrics entitled "Songs of Japan," but these proved very pleasing examples of his talent, and were effectively rendered by Mdlle. Marie Duma, Miss Greta Williams, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. Mr. Lane Wilson sang two of his own songs, and Mr. Stanley Hawley accompanied several good examples of his "recitation music," the text of which was well delivered by Mr. Brunton Steel. Vocal music by Messrs. Colin McAlpin, S. P. Waddington, Reginald Steggall, and William Wallace was sung; and some instrumental music, in the rendering of which Miss Kate Goodson, Mr. Arthur Hinton, Mr. T. Chapman, Mr. S. P. Waddington, and Mr. John Thomas took part, went to make up a pleasant musical afternoon.

THE Clarence Orchestral Society justified its existence by the smooth and tasteful performance of some important compositions, in St. Martin's Town Hall, on April 29. The band, numbering about eighty, and including several lady violinists, played with spirit, precision, and respect for detail Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony (rarely so well rendered by an amateur force), Massenet's "Phèdre" overture, Mr. R. H. Walthew's stirring Festival Overture in D, the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," and one of Grieg's Norwegian dances. Mr. Lennox Clayton, the zealous conductor, in each instance had reason to be satisfied that the applause was deserved. Vocal pieces were effectively contributed by Miss Greta Williams and Mr. Arthur Walenn, and Mr. Walthew neatly played pianoforte compositions by Liszt and Chopin.

THE Civil Service Vocal Union, conducted by Mr. Alfred Furse, gave an interesting concert at the Cannon Street Hotel on the 6th ult. The most important number in the programme was Schubert's fine cantata "Night in the Forest," which, on this occasion, was sung to the accompaniment of four French horns, in accordance with the composer's intentions. That the tone colour produced by these instruments greatly enhanced the romantic, glowing beauty of the music goes without saying. Two choruses from Mendelssohn's "Œdipus" music, Barnby's madrigal "In laudem amoris," Sullivan's "The long day closes," and J. P. Harding's madrigal "Come, let us join," were amongst the other pieces sung by the society. Mr. John Dunn played several violin solos, and Messrs. Charles Chilley and A. H. Gee contributed songs.

THE number of candidates for Trinity College, London, local examinations in musical knowledge (theory), to take place on the 5th inst., at centres in Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Canada, and Jamaica, is 3,519, being the largest number of candidates ever presented by the Colonies. The examinations are identical in every respect with those to be held this month in the United Kingdom. Four open musical scholarships will be competed for at Trinity College in July next: one pianoforte, one vocal, one violin, and one for another orchestral instrument, all tenable for three years. The Benedict Pianoforte Exhibition, Sims Reeves Vocal Exhibition, and one exhibition in each of the subjects of organ, violin, viola, violoncello, and double-bass, all tenable for one year, will be offered at the same time. The last day of entry is the 5th inst.

THE bands engaged by the London County Council for public performances in the parks during the summer had a combined rehearsal at Queen's Hall, on the 12th ult., of some of the principal pieces selected for the season. The classical element was conspicuous by its absence, reliance being chiefly placed upon selections from the light musical pieces of the period, marches, and sketchy compositions—on the whole, efficiently rendered. The most important pieces in the programme were a mélange of airs from Wagner's earlier works and Mr. Edward Jones's overture to the play "The Daughters of Babylon." Considering the strenuous endeavours in other directions to promote education, a musical scheme that ignores the great masters must be pronounced disappointing.

MISS SOPHIE FREEMAN, one of the most promising of our younger pianists, gave a successful recital at Steinway Hall, on April 29. Her own contributions comprised examples both of the classical and modern. After a brilliant and telling rendering of Beethoven's famous Sonata (Op. 53), and joining MM. Martin Jacoby and Albert in a careful performance of Dvorák's Trio in B flat, Miss Freeman played with marked neatness and judgment several short pieces. Among these were Mr. Francesco Berger's spirited "Moto Contrario" and piquant "Polka de Concert," the latter of which proved so acceptable that it was repeated by general desire. In songs by Schumann, Handel, and others, Madame Amy Sherwin was well received.

MISS EMMA BARNETT'S pianoforte recital in Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 10th ult., had for substantial features Schubert's Sonata in D major (Op 53) and Schumann's popular "Carnival" (Op. 9). The spirit of each of these was admirably caught, none of the principal points being missed. Miss Barnett also succeeded in adequately reflecting the poetic feeling which characterises Tschaïkowsky's Barcarolle. Some slight pianoforte pieces by Mr. J. F. Barnett were introduced, one of which, "Dream Maiden," was performed for the first time and with a favourable result. The vocalist was Miss Ada Davies, who, in Massenet's "Elégie" and Clay's "She wandered down the mountain side," evinced command of expression.

THE 243rd festival of the Sons of the Clergy took place in St. Paul's Cathedral on the 12th ult. As usual, an imposing musical service was conducted by Dr. G. C. Martin, there being a full orchestra, whilst the Cathedral choir was supplemented by considerable contingents from Westminster Abbey, the Temple, and elsewhere. Notable features were Sullivan's noble "In Memoriam" overture, Handel's "Coronation" anthem, and Baptiste Calkin's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis from the Service in G, composed for the Dedication festival of 1882. The anthem was Sir John Stainer's "A Prayer for the Queen and Nation," a spirited and solidly constructed work, rendered with appropriate fervour and impressiveness.

THE revival, on the 5th ult., at the Savoy Theatre, of Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's "Yeomen of the Guard" may be said to have added to the attractiveness of the present London season. The grim and pathetic humour of its story, which has for its centre-point the Tower of London, places the work in touch with the spirit of patriotism which is now in the air, and, moreover, two members of the original cast of 1888—Miss Rosina Brandram and Mr. Richard Temple—have been able to resume their personations. The opening performance was conducted by the composer, who had a most hearty reception from an audience that evinced the enthusiasm common to a successful "first night."

M. E. JAQUES-DALCROZE gave, on the 14th ult., at Steinway Hall, the first of a proposed series of three concerts of his compositions. On the occasion referred to the programme consisted of pianoforte and violin pieces and some songs, all of which were more remarkable for tasteful and refined expression than for power or depth of sentiment. They are, however, of a graceful and pleasing character, and would be very acceptable in the drawing-room. M. Dalcroze played the pianoforte pieces with the agility and delicacy they demanded, and the violin and vocal music was effectively rendered by M. Alberto Bachmann and Mdlle. Faliero, both capable and well trained artists.

THE Mozart Society must be complimented on the programme at Queen's (Small) Hall on the 1st ult. It included Beethoven's Trio in C minor, effectively rendered by Mr. Armitage, Miss Armitage, and Herr A. Schmid; Mozart's Trio in E flat for pianoforte, violin, and viola, in which Herr Bonawitz, Mdlles. Bertha and Cecilie A. Brousil distinguished themselves; and the Andante from Dvorák's Concerto for violoncello, for Herr Schmid, who again demonstrated absolute mastery of the instrument. Some pianoforte compositions were well played by Herr Bonawitz, and Miss Kate Bartholomew's vocal contributions were welcome.

THE Streatham Choral Society gave the second concert of the present season at the Town Hall, on the 3rd ult., when Gounod's "Messe Solennelle" and Mendelssohn's "Athalie" were successfully performed, under the able direction of Mr. Stewart Macpherson. The solo vocalists in the first work were Miss Stanley Lucas, Mr. W. Green, and Mr. F. Ranalow; and in "Athalie," Miss Lucas, Miss Mary Beynon, and Miss Amy Lott, the illustrative verses being recited by Mr. Charles Fry. There was an excellent professional orchestra, who gave due effect to the accompaniments, and the choir sang with precision and intelligence.

THE excellent results which may follow municipal interest of a practical kind in music is shown in the admirable list of works performed by the Municipal Orchestra of Bournemouth at sixty concerts given between October, 1896, and May, 1897. No less than fifty-three overtures, forty-five symphonies, twenty suites, ten pianoforte concertos, &c., all of the highest class, are recorded as having been played. This record reflects the greatest credit on the able conductor, Mr. Dan Godfrey, jun., and should stimulate other municipalities to follow so excellent an example in the way of elevating the tastes of the people.

THE nineteenth convention of the Music Teachers' National Association will be held at the Grand Central Palace, New York City, from the 24th to the 28th inst. Under the auspices of, and in connection with, the convention will be held the first annual exhibition of the music trades of America. All the leading publishers and pianoforte houses will be represented, and it is hoped that the importance of the exhibits will be equal to the occasion. Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. will occupy stand No. 25 and will show specimens of their publications, as well as many articles of interest to music-lovers.

PROFESSOR C. V. STANFORD'S "Revenge" was produced for the first time on the Continent, on April 23, at a concert given by the Berlin Philharmonic Choir. It was most warmly received by the public, who recalled the composer twice. We hear that the choir and band also liked the work. The critics, however, almost without exception, spoke unfavourably of it, some going out of their way to betray political bias in sitting in judgment on a work of art, thus showing that, in one respect at least, they have still something to learn from their London confrères.

ON April 30 the gentlemen of the choir of St. Matthew's Church, Denmark Hill, gave a complimentary banquet to Dr. J. Warriner to celebrate the completion of his ten years' work as organist and choirmaster. A congratulatory address and four beautifully bound volumes of Grove's "Dictionary of Music" were presented to Dr. Warriner in acknowledgment of his valued services to the music of the church. Dr. Warriner's choirboys also presented him with a very handsome album containing their photographs.

THE following competitions have taken place during the month at the Royal Academy of Music: on the 1st ult. the Sainton Scholarship, awarded to Elsie M. Southgate. The examiners highly commended Sidney A. Freedman and Margaret S. Holloway. On the same day the Goring Thomas Scholarship (for composition), awarded to Harry Farjeon. On the 7th ult. the Liszt Scholarship, awarded to Regina Druiff (of Walthamstow), Harriett Claiborne Dixon and Vera Margolies being highly commended.

THE following artists have given concerts in London during the past month: Miss Evelyn Ward and Mr. Owen Morgan, Mdlle. Amélie Molitor, Madame Bini-Puzzi and Mdlle. Fanny Puzzi, Mr. Gabriel Thorp, Mr. S. Rose Suravitch, Mr. E. van der Straeten, Madame Dyna Beumer, Miss Jane Crompton, Mdlle. Agnes Valleris and Miss Honor Brooke, the Misses Nora and Frederica Conway, Miss Jane Dempster, Miss Anita Sutherland, Miss Louisa Macpherson, Miss Clara Butt, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Brereton.

AN attractive dramatic and musical recital was given, on the 12th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall, by Miss Eileen Munro and Mr. Patrick Munro, both of whom showed considerable versatility and artistic perception in the recitations of several poems, and in an amusing duologue entitled "A Ball-room Comedy." Vocal and instrumental music was supplied by Miss Grainger-Kerr, Miss Florence Munro, Mr. Charles Copland, and Mr. Alexander Humphreys. A musical sketch was also given by Mr. Quenton Ashlyn.

THE Harringay Glee and Madrigal Society gave its second annual concert, on April 22, under the direction of Mr. Ernest Marriott, the conductor of the society. The singing of the choir was heartily applauded, as were the various pieces sung by members of the St. Paul's Cathedral choir. The solo vocalists were Miss Olive Harcourt and Miss Cissie Read, Messrs. Marriott, Morgan, H. Stubbs, G. Stubbs, and Vernon Taylor (of St. Paul's), and Mr. Sadleur Browne.

THE Merchant Taylors' School Choral Society gave its twenty-second annual concert in the hall of the school on the 11th ult., in the presence of a large audience. The principal feature of the programme was Mr. F. C. Wood's cantata "King Harold," which was rendered with precision and intelligence, under the direction of Mr. Edmund Rogers. Mr. E. G. Croager and Mr. D. Bradfield were at the pianoforte and harmonium respectively.

A SUCCESSFUL concert was given by the Park Church Choral Society, Highbury, under the excellent conductorship of Mr. John Cook, on the 6th ult., when Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" was the principal feature. The vocal soloists were Mrs. Trevor-Hankey, Mr. David Watkins, and Mr. James Girdwood; and the instrumental performers included Mr. Harold E. Mackinlay (pianoforte), Mr. Frederick Meen (organ), and Mr. S. N. Norman (violin).

THE Dean of Winchester appeals for subscriptions for the reconstruction of the Cathedral organ. This instrument, built by Mr. Henry Willis, obtained the prize in the Great Exhibition of 1851, and established its builder's great reputation. Another interesting feature connected with the organ is that Dr. S. S. Wesley played on it for sixteen years, and the proposed restoration will be a fitting memorial of that eminent organist and church musician.

THE sixth season of the Lewisham Choral Society concluded on April 29, when Gounod's "Redemption" was performed. The vocalists were Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Muriel Heath, Mr. Charles Ellison, Mr. John Gritton, and Mr. Charles Copland. The chorus, about ninety voices, sang with great intelligence and enthusiasm. Mr. W. J. Kipps presided at the organ, Mr. E. Newland-Smith led the orchestra, and Mr. Frank Idle conducted.

The Barnes Choral Society gave its annual concert on April 29, when the chief attraction was Mr. Hamish MacCunn's cantata "The Lay of the last Minstrel." Mdlle. Pauline Gilardoni, Miss E. Higinbotham, Mr. W. Goodale, and Signor Frank Celli were the vocalists; the Rev. P. H. O. de Waal and Miss E. Ortner, the accompanists; and Dr. Marshall conducted.

York Minster was the scene of an imposing ceremony on "Military Sunday," the 16th ult., when Sir Alexander Mackenzie's "Victor's March," from "The Story of Sayid," was performed by the band of the 17th Lancers, under the direction of Mr. Manuel Bilton, bandmaster, with magnificent effect.

At the marriage of Mr. Archibald Dawes Ramsden (son of Mr. Archibald Ramsden) to Miss Mary Glass, on the 11th ult., at All Saints' Church, Norwood, M. Tivadar Nachèz played the Benedictus by Sir A. C. Mackenzie, and Mr. Orlando Harley sang "In native worth," from the "Creation." Mr. Frederic Cliffe accompanied and played the Wedding March.

The annual distribution of prizes at the London Society for Teaching the Blind, St. John's Wood, was held on the 1st ult., when a selection of music was performed by the students under the direction of Mr. Edwin Barnes, professor of music at the Institution. Dr. C. W. Pearce was the examiner in music.

Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride" was well performed by a full band and chorus at a concert given by the Richmond Philharmonic Society on April 28. The vocalists were Miss Saidée Kaiser, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Arthur Strugnell, and Mr. James Brown conducted.

At the meeting of the Musical Association, on the 8th inst., by special request of the Council, Mr. W. H. Cummings, principal of the Guildhall School of Music, will read a paper on "Music during the Queen's Reign," treating the subject from a high standpoint.

On the 1st ult. the choral society of the Battersea Polytechnic gave a capital performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." The soloists were Miss E. Fenn, Miss Susetta Fenn, Mr. Sinclair Dunn, and Mr. A. E. Newcome. Dr. Dunstan conducted.

Mr. Joseph D. McLaren, so long associated with the late Mr. Carl Rosa, and for the past five years manager of Concert-Direction Daniel Mayer, has commenced business as a musical agent at Ashton's Library, 38, Old Bond Street.

Dr. Arthur Henry Mann, organist of King's College Chapel, has been appointed organist to the University of Cambridge. Dr. Mann is a worthy successor to the late Dr. Garrett.

The annual musical festival of the Lower Rhine is to be held during the present month at Aix-la-Chapelle and will, as usual, occupy three days—viz., from the 6th to the 8th inst.

The thirteenth Silesian musical festival is to be held at Görlitz from the 20th to the 22nd of this month.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Amsterdam.—Successful performances, under the composer's direction, have taken place recently, both here and in other leading towns of Holland, of Mdlle. Cornélie van Oostezee's orchestral tone-pictures "Idylls of the King," first produced some time since by the Berlin Philharmonic Society. The lady has been appointed an honorary member of the Haarlem Bach Society.——Two performances were announced to be given on the 15th and 17th ult., at the Communal Theatre, by the very enterprising Wagner Society, under M. Viotta's direction, of "Götterdämmerung," with the co-operation of Mesdames Reuss-Belce (of Carlsruhe), Wittich (of Dresden), MM. Burgstaller (of Bayreuth), and other artists, the orchestra being that of the Concertgebouw.

Barcelona.—Among the numerous concerts which have taken place during April may be instanced one of the Catalonian Society, conducted by M. Crickboom, the excellent Belgian musician, which included numbers for string orchestra by Handel, Mozart, and Grieg, as well as Beethoven's Septet; one of a series of symphony concerts under the direction of Señor Nicolau, devoted to César Franck, Lalo, and other French masters; a concert of sacred music by the Catalonian Society devoted to the sixteenth century Spanish masters, Morales, Guerrero, Vittoria, and others; not to mention a number of eminent virtuosi, including Señor Sarasate, who have attracted numerous audiences during the month.

Bergamo.—In anticipation of the forthcoming birth-centenary of Donizetti, an interesting publication has just been issued, containing articles devoted to the composer by Parmento, Orsini, Sartori, Valli, and other well-known writers, as well as a representation of the monument to be unveiled, and other illustrations.

Berlin.—At the Lessing Theatre Messrs. Owen Hall and Sidney Jones' operetta "The Geisha" was given, for the first time in Germany, on the 1st ult., and was received with high favour. The performance, moreover, by the Ferenczy operetta company was an excellent one, with Fräulein Werber in the titular part. C. M. Röhr and Julius Freund are the authors of the German version of the libretto.——A notable event in the concert-room was the appearance, on April 28, of M. Colonne, of Paris, as conductor of the Philharmonic Concert. The programme included the overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," by Lalo, the C minor Symphony (with organ and pianoforte) by Saint-Saëns, and Berlioz' "Sinfonie fantastique." The distinguished French conductor met with a most cordial reception. The concert of the Stern'sche Gesangverein on April 24 was devoted to the memory of Brahms, and comprised a very fine performance of the "Deutsches Requiem" and the Adagio from the violin concerto by that master (the latter played by Herr Carl Halir), as well as the noble cantata "Liebster Gott wann werd ich sterben," by Sebastian Bach; Professor Gernsheim, as usual, conducting. Handel's "Deborah," in Dr. Chrysander's edition, is to be produced during the coming season, when this society celebrates the fiftieth anniversary of its existence.——Joseph Hoffmann has just returned to his residence here, after an extended concert tour in Russia, in the course of which he played on seventeen occasions in St. Petersburg alone, with brilliant success. ——Von Taundt's "Der Wunderknabe" ("The little Genius"), brought out recently at the Theatre Unter den Linden, had to be withdrawn after the sixth performance. As a critic remarks, like many "youthful prodigies," it did not live long.

Brussels.—The International Exhibition was formally opened by King Leopold on the 10th ult., the ceremony including the performance of an inaugural cantata by M. Paul Gilson. The composer is one of the most talented members of the younger Flemish school of musicians, and his present work, which skilfully embodies and contrapuntally combines four old Flemish folk-songs, is admitted on all hands to be a very fine composition. It was ably conducted by M. Joseph Dupont, the performance taking place in the open air, and it was repeated under similar conditions on the 16th ult. The projected special musical performances to be given in the Exhibition Hall have unfortunately become very doubtful, it having been found that the acoustic conditions of the hall are so bad as to render it useless for the purpose without extensive structural alterations. The performances were to have included the production of Mr. Edgar Tinel's new oratorio "Sainte Godelive," Beethoven's Mass in D and Ninth Symphony, under Dr. Richter's direction, besides a number of orchestral concerts to be conducted by MM. Dupont and Ysaye.——The performances of opera at the Théâtre de la Monnaie terminated on the 2nd ult. M. Vincent d'Indy's "Fervaal," as it was the chief novelty, has also been the principal success of the season. Amongst the artists who have appeared in temporary engagements, Miss Brema has succeeded in initiating herself into the favour of the public here to a degree which far out-distances all others. The lady will doubtless return again next season.

COETHEN.—The eleventh musical festival of the State of Anhalt took place on the 8th and 9th ult., with the co-operation of the excellent orchestra of the Dessau Opera, and under the direction of Herr August Klughardt. Haydn's "Creation," a symphony in C minor, by Klughardt, and excerpts from Wagner's music-dramas were the principal numbers in the programmes.

COLOGNE.—The first performance took place on April 20, at the Stadt-Theater, of a three-act tragic opera, "Die Halliger," a Scandinavian subject borrowed from a novel by Perfall, the music proving in parts highly effective, albeit somewhat heavily orchestrated. The composer, Herr Friedrich Koch, formerly a violoncellist at the Berlin Opera, was repeatedly called, and the work may be said to have scored a distinct success.——The celebrated tenor, Tamagno, made his appearance, on the 3rd ult., at the Stadt-Theater, as Manrico, in "Troubador," with brilliant success, this being the singer's début in Germany. He also subsequently sang at Frankfort-on-Main, but will not appear at the Berlin Opera, where the enormous pay demanded by the singer, or his agent, has not unnaturally been considered excessive.

DARMSTADT.—A highly impressive first scenic performance of Liszt's "St. Elizabeth" was given on April 29, at the Hof-Theater, under the direction of Herr Rehbock.

DRESDEN.—At the Royal Opera a new three-act comic opera, "Die Rosenthalerin," by Herr Anton Rückauf, was brought out under Capellmeister Schuch's direction, on the 7th ult., and greatly favoured by the audience. The action takes place at Nuremberg, with Albrecht Dürer as its central figure, and while, necessarily, not uninfluenced by Wagner's unique lyrical comedy, Herr Rückauf's score harks back rather to the lighter genre of Lortzing, and appears to be none the worse for that.——An excellent first performance took place at the Lutheran Church recently of Mr. Henschel's "Stabat Mater," the composer and his wife taking part in the solo portions. The work produced an entirely favourable impression.——Herr Bungert's remarkable music-drama "Odysseus" (part of a tetralogy) has already been performed twenty-five times since its first production here in December last, which, under Dresden conditions, indicates a most unusual success.

FRANKFORT-ON-MAIN.—A new opera, "Der Pfeifer von Haardt" (the libretto founded upon Hauff's novel "Lichtenstein"), by Herr Ferdinand Langer, was brought out with good success on the 1st ult., at the Stadt-Theater. ——Special performances of the "Nibelungen" tetralogy, "Tristan," and "Die Meistersinger," with Herren Vogl, Gerhäuser, and Friedrichs, and other Bayreuth celebrities in the cast, were given at the Stadt-Theater from the 15th to the 25th ult.

HANOVER.—Humperdinck's melodrama "Die Königskinder" was brought out at the Court Theatre, on the 1st ult., and received with high favour.

KÖNIGSBERG.—An interesting prize competition has been opened by Dr. W. Simon of this town, who offers the sum of two thousand marks for a setting for male chorus and orchestra of Goethe's poem "Meine Göttin." The jury consists of three eminent musicians, Dr. Wüllner, Joseph Rheinberger, and Max Bruch, and competitors' manuscripts have to be sent in not later than December 31 next, there being no restriction as to nationality.

LONGJUMEAU.—The monument erected to Adolphe Adam, whose "Postillon de Longjumeau" has brought unlooked-for celebrity to this little town, was announced to be unveiled here on the 23rd ult., by the Minister of Fine Arts, with appropriate musical and other ceremonies.

MASSOWA.—His Majesty, Menelik, of Abyssinia, does not intend to be any longer behind other monarchs in the matter of military bands. He has lately engaged a Russian artist, M. Miliowsky, for the purpose of organising a number of bands amongst his regiments, and is sanguine that one or other of these will be able to render a good account of itself at the great Paris Exhibition of the year 1900. M. Miliowsky will have to "hurry up"!

MILAN.—The season of concerts annually given by the Società Orchestrale at La Scala Theatre was inaugurated on the 2nd ult., under the direction of M. Lamoureux, the eminent Paris conductor, who has been engaged for the series. In the programme were the overture to Gluck's "Iphigénie en Aulide," pieces by Massenet and Vincent d'Indy, Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony. The French conductor met with a most hearty reception.

MUNICH.—Max Schillings's opera "Ingwelde," one of the most noteworthy contemporary German productions, was brought out at the Royal Theatre, on the 8th ult., under Herr Richard Strauss's direction, with Fräulein Ternina and Herr Vogl in the principal parts, and was received with marked favour by the more advanced section of the audience. Herr Strauss has just completed the composition of two sixteen-part choral pieces.

PRAGUE.—Under the auspices of the Mozart-Verein, a performance of "Don Giovanni" was given on the 12th ult., at the German Theatre, by leading members of society here, the proceeds of which will be devoted to the projected monument to the composer in the Bohemian capital.——The last concert of the season of the Philharmonic Society, on April 27, was devoted to composers of Czech nationality, and included some new works—viz., a symphony (Op. 24), by Carl Weiss; a tarantella for full orchestra, by Carl Bendl; a serenade, by Josef Suk (of the Bohemian Quartet party); and Dvorák's "Vodnik" ("Der Wassermann"), the latter especially being extremely well received, and its composer treated to a perfect ovation on the part of the audience. Herr Adolf Cech, of the National Theatre, was the conductor.

RIO DE JANEIRO.—Under the auspices of the National Musical Academy a "Life" of Carlos Gomes, the Brazilian operatic composer, author of "I Guarany," has just been published from the pen of Senhor Ernesto Vieira, to which are appended a number of eulogistic verses by Bulha Pato, Thomaz Ribeiro, Lopez de Mendonza, and other well-known writers, the Brazilians being naturally very proud of their only native composer who achieved European distinction.

STOCKHOLM.—A grand Scandinavian musical festival is to be held here during Whitsuntide, extending over six days.

STRASSBURG.—A permanent faculty for musical science and history has just been created at this University by the appointment to a professorship of Dr. Jacobsthal, hitherto attached to the staff only in the capacity of private lecturer.

STUTTGART.—The fifth Suabian musical festival, held here from the 15th to the 17th ult., included the performance of Schubert's grand Mass in E flat major, Brahms's Rhapsody for contralto solo, male chorus, and orchestra, and the same composer's Second Symphony; Liszt's "Les Préludes," Bach's Concerto for string orchestra, Dvorák's Rhapsody (No. 2), as well as, amongst solo performances, Beethoven's Violin Concerto, interpreted by Professor Heermann, the proceedings terminating with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The conductors were Dr. Hans Richter and Dr. A. Obrist, of Stuttgart.

THE HAGUE.—The Royal French Opera terminated a very successful season on the 1st ult., M. Joseph Mertens, who for the last six years conducted the performances with conspicuous ability, retiring from the post. He will be succeeded next season by M. Burwolf, formerly conductor of the Théâtre de la Monnaie.

TRIESTE.—Kienzl's "Der Evangelimann" was produced for the first time here, at the Armonia Theatre, with complete success. Madame Darée and Herr Januschke were in the principal parts; the choruses, an important feature of the work, being admirably sung.

VENICE. — Signor Leoncavallo's new opera, "La Bohème," founded, like Puccini's, upon Henri Murger's romance, the composer, however, being in this case his own librettist, was produced for the first time at the Teatro Fenice, on the 6th ult., and favourably received. Puccini's work was likewise performed here for the first time some days previously. Signor Mascagni is also reported to be engaged upon an opera on the same subject, which threatens to become epidemical amongst composers of "young Italy."

VIENNA.—A very successful complete performance of the "Nibelungen" tetralogy was given at the Imperial Opera during the last week of April, with Frau Sedlmair and Herr Winkelmann in leading parts. Herr Gustav Mahler, of Hamburg, entered upon his functions as assistant-conductor of the Opera on the 1st ult., and has given very general satisfaction with the first work conducted by him, "Lohengrin." He is an Austrian by birth, but has gained his reputation chiefly in Germany. It is a noteworthy fact, by the way, that the most prominent conductors in the fatherland at the present day—Weingartner, Mottl, Nikisch—are natives of Austria-Hungary.——Frau Amalie Materna, the eminent interpreter of Wagnerian heroines, who sang the part of Brünnhilde at the original Bayreuth performances, took her final leave of the Viennese public at a concert given by the "Concordia" Society, on April 23, when she sang an air from "Tannhäuser" and "Isolde's Liebestod" in excellent voice and with her accustomed dramatic fire almost unimpaired. Needless to add that her performance aroused the greatest enthusiasm, mingled with renewed regret at her definite retirement. The lady will, however, we understand, continue to devote her talent to the training for the operatic stage of a few gifted pupils. ——An interesting concert was given on the 7th ult., by the Slavonic Gesangverein, under the direction of Herr M. Hubad, an excellent musician and experienced conductor. The numbers performed, exclusively by Slav composers, included two duets for female voices and portions of the "Stabat Mater" by Dvorák, which were immensely appreciated, as well as an overture, "In the Tatra mountains," by Zelensky, and pieces by Tschaïkowsky, Bendl, Smetana, and others.——Humperdinck's "Die Königskinder" met with its very successful first Viennese performance at the Theater an der Wien, on the 10th ult., under Capellmeister Müller's direction.——The sum of 1,000 florins was distributed by the Tonkünstler Verein amongst necessitous musicians of both sexes, on the 7th ult., the anniversary of Brahms's birth, in honour of the composer's memory.

OBITUARY.

THE death of Dr. J. P. N. LAND, at Arnhem, in the Netherlands, on April 30, at the age of sixty-three years, has removed from us a searching spirit in ways of musical art but little known to musical students, and far less cultivated. He was a professor of philosophy at the University of Leyden, but failing health in 1894 caused him to resign a position of eminence, in which his wide learning and delightful character made him conspicuous, and he retired to Arnhem. His achievements in philosophy and as an Oriental scholar might have overshadowed the outcome of his musical pursuits but for the solid basis on which the latter were raised, aided by his linguistic attainments, for he wrote in French, German, and English, as well as in his native tongue. A brief enumeration of his musical publications are—one in Dutch, "The lute book of Thysius described and explained" (1880); in collaboration with the late W. J. A. Jonckbloet, "Musique et Musiciens au 17me siècle. Correspondance et Oeuvres Musicales de Constantin Huygens" (Leyden, 1882), an important volume which has greatly extended our knowledge of the charming musical life of the Low Countries and England during the first half of that century; an exhaustive examination of the Arabic scale, which had previously been much misunderstood, "Recherches sur l'Histoire de la Gamme Arabe" (Leyden, 1884); a contribution to the German "Vierteljahrsschrift für Musikwissenschaft," entitled "Tonschriftversuche und Melodieproben aus dem muhammedanischen Mittelalter" (Leipzig, September, 1886); again in Dutch, "Upon our knowledge of Javanese Music" (1891); and lastly, in English, "Remarks on the earliest development of Arabic music," an admirable paper to be found in the Proceedings of the London Oriental Congress, September, 1892. These essays, invaluable to the musical historian and student, claim the respect of musical readers, even had Dr. Land done no more in other departments of knowledge, and make us regret his loss.

The death occurred, on April 12, at Berlin, of Dr. HANS MÜLLER, secretary of the Royal Academy of Fine Arts and professor at the Royal Hochschule für Musik, aged forty-two. The author of several valuable articles on musical subjects, notably "Die Musik Wilhelm's von Hirschau" and "Hucbald's echte und unechte Schriften," he was appointed to the professorship of musical history at the Hochschule in 1886. He was a son of the poet Wolfgang Müller, of Königswinter.

GUSTAV BARTH, the first conductor of the celebrated Vienna Maenner-Gesangverein, died at Frankfort-on-Main, on the 10th ult., aged eighty-six. An excellent musician and able conductor, he had a conspicuous share in raising the Viennese society, founded in 1835, to its present world-famed position. Amongst his numerous compositions, chiefly vocal, his setting of Robert Burns's "My heart's in the Highlands" has, perhaps, become most widely known. His wife, Madame Hasselt-Barth, was in her time a singer of some celebrity.

One of the most eminent of Italian Church musicians, SALVATORE MELUZZI, died at Rome on April 17, at the age of eighty-two. He was chapelmaster of the basilica of St. Peter's of the Vatican, and for forty-five years had been director of the Capella Giulia. He possessed a unique acquaintance with the works of the old Italian masters, particularly those of Palestrina, and amongst his numerous compositions are a Mass for double choir, a Requiem, and a very fine Stabat Mater. As an organist he took high rank.

The celebrated Italian tenor, ROBERTO STAGNO, who for a period of some twenty years occupied a prime position in the favour of his countrymen, died on April 26, at Genoa, of heart disease, aged sixty-one. Born at Palermo, the son of a wealthy merchant, he studied under Mariot and Giuseppe Lamperti, and in the course of his career undertook several operatic tours in Europe and the United States, where his charming and powerful voice secured him a series of successes. He appeared in London at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1876, in conjunction with Madame Nilsson, in "Faust" and "Roberto il Diavolo," but his success here was less pronounced, it being considered that his style was wanting in artistic finish. He was married to Signora Gemma Bellincioni in 1881, and was the possessor of a most valuable collection of musical instruments, containing some unique specimens.

Count NICOLAS ESTERHAZY, whose death, at the age of fifty-eight, occurred on the 7th ult., at his country seat of Totis, in Hungary, was the last representative of that distinguished family of art-patrons and dilettanti whose name has become historically associated with those of Haydn, Beethoven, and Schubert. Count Nicolas was himself an ardent lover of dramatic and musical art, who freely extended his patronage to struggling talent, and it is said that over two hundred young musicians, some of whom have risen to some eminence in the profession, have been enabled, through his munificence, to make their studies at the conservatoires of Vienna and Budapesth.

The death is announced, on April 5, at Pretoria, of Mr. A. WAUGH BULLEN, organist of St. Alban's Cathedral in that town, at the early age of nineteen. Mr. Bullen, who had been trained in the best traditions of English church music, became organist of a church at Dulwich before he had yet attained the age of fourteen, and had not completed his seventeenth year when, some three years ago, he was appointed to the South African organistship, with the duties of which he combined those of organist to the Pretoria Choral Society. The deceased, whose promising career has been thus prematurely cut short, had, by his gentle and unassuming manners, gained many friends in his adopted home, and the general manifestation of public sympathy at the funeral cannot fail to be a source of some consolation to his bereaved relatives in this country.

We regret to have to record the death, on the 5th ult., of Mr. THURLEY BEALE, the well-known baritone vocalist, at the age of fifty. He was a native of Royston, in Hertfordshire, and at the age of fifteen came to London, where he joined the "John Hullah Choral Society," his fine voice subsequently securing him an appointment in the choir of St. Andrew's, Wells Street, then under the direction of the late Sir Joseph Barnby, from whom he received most valuable instruction, and who continued to take an active interest in the further career of the singer. It was through his influence that he obtained an engagement to sing at several of the oratorio concerts at St. James's Hall and Exeter Hall, and, having meanwhile exchanged the St. Andrew's choir for that of St. Paul's Cathedral, he also acquired a reputation in the provinces. In 1877, owing to increasing concert-work, he resigned his post at the Cathedral, and for a considerable period held a prominent position at the musical festivals, Novello's Oratorio concerts, the Crystal Palace, and elsewhere. He also appeared with success on the lyrical stage in the leading bass part of Hervé's "L'Œil Crevé," at the Opera Comique, under Mr. D'Oyly Carte's early management.

Mr. Ernest Lockwood, the famous harpist, for many years a member of the Royal Italian Opera, the Crystal Palace, and Philharmonic orchestras, died in London, on April 21, at the age of fifty-seven.

Mr. J. Winterbottom, for many years bandmaster of the Royal Marine Artillery, died at his residence at Putney on the 16th ult., at the mature age of eighty. He was a bassoon player in Jullien's orchestra in his younger days, afterwards became a bandmaster in Sydney, and, on his return from Australia in 1873, was appointed to organise the newly-formed band of the Royal Marine Artillery, from which post he retired, after twenty-one years' successful service, in 1893. Since then he has been bandmaster of the Artists' Rifle Corps. The deceased's family has been associated with the British Army for generations, his father having fought in the Life Guards at Waterloo.

Mr. Michael Alfred Noyer, who for more than a quarter of a century had been organist and choirmaster at the Carmelite Church, Kensington, died on the 9th ult. He was a native of Limoges, in France, and a choirboy at the Cathedral of that town, and after studying at the Paris Conservatoire was appointed to the post of répétiteur at the Opéra. Upon the termination of the Franco-German war, in which he had taken his share, Mr. Noyer came to England, and shortly after obtained the Kensington organistship, and was also appointed professor of music at the convents of the Assumption, Kensington Square, and of the Sacred Heart at Roehampton and Brighton. His organ playing was characterised by brilliancy and refinement, and amongst his numerous compositions for the church are two Masses, a "Veni Creator" and an "Ave Maria." His loss is most severely felt by the Carmelite Fathers and their numerous congregation.

We much regret to have to record the death, on April 16, of the Right Hon. Lord Charles Bruce, who has been chairman of the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music since its formation. He was an ideal chairman, genial and courteous to all with whom his office brought him into contact, and his death leaves a void which it will be difficult to fill.

Sir William C. F. Robinson, the Colonial Governor, whose death occurred on the 2nd ult., was the composer of several popular songs, as well as of an opera, "Predatoros," on the subject of the "Nut Brown Maid," successfully brought out in Australia. He greatly interested himself in matters musical whilst at Melbourne, and kept open house for all musical artists from the mother country.

We have also to record the following deaths:

On April 18, at Amsterdam, Professor A. D. Loman, well-known author on the history of church music in the Netherlands, aged seventy-three.

On April 19, at Kennington Park Road, Jacob Bradford, Mus. Doc., Oxon., of pneumonia.

On April 19, at Rome, Count A. Roncalli, scientist, inventor of an apparatus for the automatical transcription of music played on the pianoforte, which obtained several prizes at international exhibitions.

On April 19, at Aix (Provence), Ferdinand Kamm, popular vocal composer, professor at the Cantonal school of St. Gall, Switzerland, aged fifty-two.

On the 4th ult., at New York, Max Maretzek, formerly successful operatic manager in the United States.

On the 10th ult., at Carlsbad, Joseph Hiebsch, professor of violin and singing at the Teachers' Seminary, Vienna, author of valuable theoretical works.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CREYGHTON'S CATHEDRAL MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Can any of your readers give me any information as to the compositions of Robert Creyghton? He was, I believe, Precentor of Wells, dying there in 1736, and in that Cathedral some of his music is still sung from MS. copies, made, as far as I can gather, about 1790. These copies must very soon be laid aside, some being already in very bad condition. In the hope of substituting printed copies for some of these, I procured Novello's edition of some of his works, but in many instances I find these entirely different from our MS. copies. I should be glad to know if Novello's edition has good authority, since the use of printed copies would save an immense amount of labour and expense.—I remain, yours truly,

Percy C. Buck,
Wells. Organist of Wells Cathedral.

[It is quite possible that the MS. copies are wrong, due to careless and perhaps frequent copying. The Service in B flat (Novello's Edition) was edited by Ouseley, a very high authority, and that in E flat is from the "Aldrich MS. collection." There are manuscripts of Creyghton's Service in B flat, "I will arise," and "Praise the Lord, O my soul," in the library of Ely Cathedral. Organ parts of the following are in the library of the Royal College of Music: The Services in B flat, E flat, C, and C (short service), and five anthems; also separate parts of "I will arise," which is almost the only thing which keeps Creyghton's name in remembrance. Robert Creyghton, or Creighton, died at Wells, February 17, 1733-34 (not 1736), and was buried on February 22.—Ed., M. T.]

CLEMENTI'S TOMB.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In the South walk of the beautiful old cloisters of Westminster Abbey there is a simple gravestone, lying flat on the ground, bearing the following memorable inscription:

Muzio Clementi, called the Father of the Pianoforte; his fame as a musician and composer acknowledged throughout Europe procured him the honour of a public interment in this cloister.
Born at Rome, 1752,
Died at Evesham, 1832.

This tomb, which ought to be held dear and sacred by every true musician, and which I myself have reverentially visited on countless occasions, has now become so worn and dilapidated that it is with difficulty that one can decipher the inscription which I have just quoted. A complete renovation of this plain slab covering the remains of the immortal Muzio Clementi is therefore urgently needed, and I trust that the restoration may be taken in hand by the Westminster Abbey authorities without further delay.—Very faithfully yours,

Algernon Ashton.

44, Hamilton Gardens, St. John's Wood,
May 19, 1897.

At Ladbroke Hall, on the 13th ult., an interesting amateur performance was given of a musical play founded on the story of "Rip van Winkle." The dialogue and lyrics were written by Mr. W. Cooke-Yarborough (who undertook the title-rôle), and the music of the songs and dances, which was very piquant and melodious, was composed by Mr. Frank Tours. Among those who may be mentioned especially, besides Mr. Yarborough, are Messrs. C. S. Adams, C. Andrews, A. F. Harrison, W. C. Peskett, and Miss May Miller (who represented Gretchen). There was a small string orchestra, and Mr. Cyril W. Miller conducted.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. C. (Grimsby).—The words of Sir John Stevenson's celebrated glee, "See our oars with feather'd spray," are by H. B. Code, an Irishman. The glee is from an opera entitled "Spanish Patriots a thousand years ago, a dramatic romance" (libretto by Code, music by Stevenson), which was produced at the Lyceum Theatre, September 22, 1812, though it had previously been performed as a melodrama in Dublin. The following is prefixed to the original edition of the glee: "A boat is seen in the distance, the crew of which sing the following glee as they approach the shore."

P. W. D. (Batley).—Life is too short to discuss notational fads. Notation is not music. Beethoven did not write the chromatic scale for the sake of pleasing or displeasing certain theorists, he merely wanted a succession of semitones to be played. It is said that Mendelssohn was once asked the root of the first chord in his "Wedding March," and that he replied: he didn't know and he didn't care; he liked it.

Candidate (Rhyl).—We are afraid that there is no help for it but to practise assiduously and to satisfy the examiners, who seem to attach an undue importance to a feature of the examination which has no practical bearing upon an organist's duties. The specimen you send us has the appearance of a disfigured bass.

F. W. H.—The Deed, if it be the superior document, would override the Agreement; but in all such legal matters it is better to consult a solicitor.

W. P. (Norwood).—Clarinets in A are played a minor third lower than written.

Enquirer.—The Musical World began on March 18, 1836.

Maud (Exmouth).—Yes; the villain is generally a bass.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Abergavenny.—The Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. R. Carr, gave a successful miscellaneous vocal and instrumental concert on April 29, at the Town Hall. H. Lemare. Songs were contributed by Miss Hilda Wilson and Mr. Hirwen Jones.

Carlisle.—The Male-Voice Choir is a new departure in the Border city, having only been formed last October, but it has already taken rank among the best musical organisations of the district. The first concert was given on April 29, in the County Hall. The performance of the well-selected part-songs was excellent, and it was manifest that Mr. W. H. Reid, the conductor, had trained the choir with great care and skill. The solo vocalists were Madame L. Smart, Madame M. Bellas, and Mr. D. Kellet. Mr. Henderson was solo violinist, and Mr. Frank Marshall rendered intelligently Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise (No. 12) for pianoforte.

Chard.—The Musical Society produced with much success, on April 29, under the conductorship of the composer, a "Requiem," by the Rev. H. N. Dymond. The voices, eighty in number, were well balanced, and the results obtained reflected great credit on the conductor, Mr. Thomas Johnson.

GLOUCESTER.—A concert of exceptional interest was given on the 5th ult., in the Shire Hall, by the Choral Society. The vocalists were Miss Maggie Davis and Miss L. Hodder, and instrumental chamber music was admirably rendered by Madame Frickenhaus and Messrs. Johannes Wolff, Alfred Gibson, and Pezze. The performance was varied by recitations dramatically given by Miss Olive Kennett and Mr. Charles Fry.

The second part of the programme included the third and fourth of Cowen's "English Dances in the Olden Style," Kjerulf's "Norwegian Bridal song," Barnby's chorus for female voices, "Sweet May," and the five-part madrigals, "My love is fair" (Leslie) and "What saith my dainty darling?" (Morley).

HIGH WYCOMBE.—The Choral Association, conducted by Mr. J. G. Wrigley, gave, on April 26, a "Diamond Jubilee concert," at the Central Hall. The programme included Sullivan's "On Shore and Sea," Mackenzie's chorus "Lord of life," and Foster's part-song "The Queen." The vocal soloists were Miss Lilian Turnbull and Mr. James Brand.

HORSHAM.—The Musical Society gave a highly commendable performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," on April 29, at the King's Head Assembly Rooms. Mr. A. Barlow sustained the part of the Prophet with conspicuous success, and the other vocalists who proved themselves well-trained musicians were Miss Helen Jaxon, Miss Jeanie Rankin, and Mr. James Leyland. In the trio "Lift thine eyes" able assistance was rendered by Mrs. Hawken, and a word of praise is due to Miss Sapey, who presided at the pianoforte with marked ability. Mr. Moore conducted as usual.

LINCOLN.—The Musical Society, under the able direction of Dr. George J. Bennett, gave a successful concert, on the 6th ult., in the Drill Hall. The principal works performed were Stanford's choral ballad "The Revenge," Macfarren's cantata "May Day," and Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, the soloist in the last-named being Mdlle. Irma Sethe. Miss Lucile Hill was the solo vocalist, and the performance showed that choir and orchestra are making satisfactory progress.

MAIDENHEAD.—The Philharmonic Society concluded its recent season at the Town Hall, on April 27, with a performance of Handel's "Samson," the solos of which were sung by Miss L. Turnbull, Miss F. Croft, Mr. H. Stubbs, and Mr. E. Jackson. Mr. J. G. Wrigley conducted.

MELBOURNE (AUSTRALIA).—An impressive performance of Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion Music was given on April 1, in St. Paul's Cathedral, under the able conductorship of Mr. Ernest Wood. NEWCASTLE.—A meritorious performance of the second part of Gounod's "Redemption" was given on the 9th ult., by the choir of the Elswick Road Wesleyan Church. The solos were sung by the Misses B. Mein, J. Browne, L. Robinson, A. Moffat, and Messrs. J. H. Reah, G. H. Spark, J. Tompson, and G. H. Wilson. The accompaniments were played on the organ and pianoforte by Messrs. G. Dodds, jun., and H. Y. Dodds respectively, and Mr. George Dodds conducted.

OXFORD.—A commendable performance was given on the 4th ult., at the British School, the chief work being Mr. W. L. Biggs' fairy cantata "Marie, or the Bells of Lee," the solos of which were sung by Miss Liddell, Miss F. Green, and Messrs. Keeler, King, and Jackson. The accompaniments were played by an orchestra, the principal of which was Mr. English.

PORTSMOUTH.—A successful performance of Haydn's "Creation" was given by the Philharmonic Society, in the Town Hall, on April 22, with Madame Ada Patterson, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. R. E. Miles as soloists. Mr. A. Burnett was principal violin and Dr. F. J. Read conducted.

READING.—The Philharmonic Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Strickland, gave a performance of Sir George Macfarren's cantata "The Lady of the Lake," on the 4th ult. The soloists engaged were Miss Kate Cove, Miss Marie Hooton, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. W. H. Burgon, and the orchestra and chorus numbered 175 executants. Mr. A. F. Rippon was principal violin and Mr. J. C. B. Tirbutt presided at the organ.

RYDE.—The Musical Society closed its season on April 29 with a miscellaneous concert, which partook partly of the nature of a Schubert centenary and still more so of a Jubilee celebration. The principal works on the programme were Handel's anthem "Zadok the Priest," Schubert's cantata "The Song of Miriam," and Eaton Faning's "Queen's Song." The orchestra was drawn entirely from local sources, being composed of amateurs and of members of the band of the Isle of Wight Volunteers, and the principal violinist was Mr. F. M. Walker. Miss Edith Tancred, the soprano soloist, gave every satisfaction, especially in the Schubert songs. Miss Marguerite Watts presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. E. W. Goldsmith conducted.

STAINES.—The first performance of Dr. Huntley's Diamond Jubilee cantata "Victoria" was given on the 14th ult., by the Choral Society, under the conductorship of the composer, at the Town Hall. The dramatic solos assigned to Boadicea were effectively sung by Mrs. Huntley, and Mrs. Kearton as the Chief Bard and Mr. Bertram Mills in the bass solos were also excellent exponents of their respective parts. The choruses were well rendered, especially those which lead up to the entrance of the Queen, the vigorous and inspiriting nature of which was well realised by the choristers. The success of the performance was in no small measure owing to the efficiency of the orchestra, the principal of which was Mr. H. Hunt. The work was very warmly received, and, in answer to some remarks by Mr. Morford, the composer expressed his satisfaction with the interpretation his work had received. A good rendering was also secured of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," the soloists in which were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mrs. Huntley, and Mr. Kearton. Mr. R. F. M. Akerman, the conductor of the Society, directed this performance.

STONY STRATFORD (BUCKS).—The Choral Society gave its second concert, at the Parish Room, on the 4th ult., when the programme consisted of Gaul's cantata "The Holy City," the second part being of a miscellaneous character. The soloists were Miss D. Perry, Mrs. L. Cooper, Mr. Herbert Kimbell, and Mr. H. Coulson. The chorus singing reflected great credit on its painstaking conductor, the Rev. C. Harold Scott, and there was a very efficient orchestra, of which Mr. T. Eales was principal violin.

TONBRIDGE.—The Philharmonic Society made its initial appearance on April 27, in Haydn's "Creation." The soloists were Miss Alice Simons, Mr. Bernard Lane, and Mr. Arthur Barlow. The band and chorus numbered seventy performers. The whole concert was a great success and reflected much credit on the popular conductor, Mr. G. J. Kimmins.

THE MUSIC BY EDWARD ELGAR.

"In none of his previous works has he written so successfully for the chorus, nor has he ever shown superior melodic invention, the long passage for sopranos in unison beginning 'No more they charm the passing hours' being especially beautiful. . . . The ballad is a fine, spirited composition of no little dramatic power, and will do much to enhance its author's rapidly-growing reputation."—The Times, May 5, 1897.

SIX ACTION SONGS

MARY HUTCHINSON

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"These delightful songs were written and composed for, and are affectionately dedicated to, the children of the Kindergarten Section of the Church of England College for Girls at Edgbaston. Were there naught else to recommend them, the six titles would invite for the songs universal acceptance. Who could resist 'Haymakers,' 'Fairy Bells,' 'Flower Fairies,' 'The English Flag,' 'Calling the Cows,' and 'Fishermen'? We confess to a desire to see some of these songs done as the accompanying 'rubric' suggests. In 'Haymakers' the boys should be scythe-carriers, their action that of mowing; the little girls should imitate raking. This, with the quaint and pretty melody, and the refrain, 'Work, work, clearly we call; work, work, steadily all,' must be a grateful vision to parents, and a pleasant recreation to children, who may thank their stars that they have been born in a day which has a Mary Hutchinson and an Alfred R. Gaul to further gild the golden hours of childhood."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

SIR HERBERT OAKELEY.

Edinburgh: JAMES THIN, Publisher to the University.

"Sir Herbert Oakeley, Emeritus Professor, University of Edinburgh, has published two 'Inaugural Addresses,' selected, on account of their special fitness for a popular audience, from those delivered by him at various times. Sir Herbert spoke always, not with authority only—though his words had the weight due to admirable scholarship—but with grace and charm. His utterances were invariably characterised by wide knowledge, critical acumen, and liberal thought. Thus, in the lectures before us, we have not only an eloquent demonstration of the value of music as an educational agent, but abundant evidence of a capacity, too rare among schoolmen, to regard the subject from all points of view, and to lend it all possible aid by apt allusion and illustration."—The Globe.

DEDICATED, BY GRACIOUS PERMISSION, TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

THE FLAG OF ENGLAND

BALLAD

FOR SOPRANO SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

The Words by RUDYARD KIPLING

THE MUSIC BY

J. FREDERICK BRIDGE.

PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

Tonic Sol-fa, 9d. Words only, 12s. 6d. per 100. String Parts, 4s. 6d. Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

The vocal writing is decidedly effective. The work is undeniably above the average of "occasional" compositions, and is indeed worthy to rank with the composer's best efforts.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Dr. Bridge was well advised in selecting the poem as a text for his Jubilee Song. Good judgment equally appears in the musical treatment. Manifestly a work designed for the purpose here in view should be distinguished by features which recommend it to popular taste and feeling—that is to say, it should be tuneful, rhythmical, and simple. These are precisely the qualities that recommend the work under notice, and they are quite compatible with a large measure of picturesque effect and varied expression. . . . The picturesque poem and its happy setting, so full of spirit and fitness, at once pleased the public. The performance was indeed excellent, making quite justifiable the "ovation" promptly tendered to the principal singer and the composer-conductor. Dr. Bridge was thrice called to the platform.

STANDARD.

It opens with a martial figure on the dominant of F major, and this is heard again and again throughout the brief work. The "Winds of the World" are to declare "What is the Flag of England?" and they perform their task, Professor Bridge's music well illustrating, with all requisite variety of effect and musicianly feeling, the contrasts between the soft southern zephyrs and the wild north-easter. In the final section the vocal forces, including the soprano soloist, are divided into nine parts, and the climax is as stirring as it is musicianly instructive. The "Flag of England" is certain to prove popular with choral societies, for Professor Bridge's music is grateful for the voices, and the words are not more applicable to this than to any other year, being patriotic in a general sense.

DAILY NEWS.

The music, strictly choral, is of a descriptive character, admirably suited to the dramatic lines, while in the song of the South Wind, the soprano soloist (last night Madame Albani) has a melodious solo supported by the female chorus, and the whole closes with a short but massive double chorus. The choir had evidently taken the greatest interest in the music of their chief, and the performance was well worthy the fame of our leading choral society. Four times was Professor Bridge called to the platform.

MORNING POST.

The finest portion of the work is undoubtedly the illustration of the words of the North Wind, and the music here attains very great expressive power, particularly in the setting of the line "And they died, but the flag of England blew free ere the spirit passed." . . . No little of the success of the work is due to the effectiveness of the scoring, which is always picturesque, and often most suggestive of the spirit of the text. . . . Few new works have had a more hearty reception.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

It may at once be said that the composer has thoroughly caught the spirit of the stirring and picturesque poem. . . . It is a thoroughly musicianlike production, and of its effectiveness there can be no question. That it will speedily be in demand by choral societies is certain, for it is marked by a freshness and energy not always apparent in compositions of this description. The large force of brass and percussion employed last night is not absolutely necessary to do justice to a work that has far more valid claims to attention than is indicated by liberal orchestral adjuncts. The choralists did their very best for their conductor's latest production, and the result was a great success.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

The recurrent themes are marked by breadth and simplicity rather than distinction or nobility, but some of the episodes, notably the setting of the splendid lines "Never the lotus closes, never the wild fowl wake, But a soul goes out on the East wind that died for England's sake"—are decidedly happy. The work was finely performed and was received with great enthusiasm.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

The setting has spirit, intelligence, and a fine literary instinct. It has movement and spirit; it is, on the whole, well scored, and if it does not ever touch you into any sudden surprise of beauty—which is, let it fairly be said, the final test of great art—it is at all events sound, musicianly and inspiriting, and not unworthy of the poem.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

Dr. Bridge is to be cordially congratulated upon his capital setting of Rudyard Kipling's fine ballad "The Flag of England." It was no light undertaking, indeed, to find the musical equivalent of Mr. Kipling's noble and stirring verses; but Dr. Bridge may certainly be felicitated upon the fashion in which he has accomplished his task. The utterances of the rough North wind, anon of the languorous southern breezes, and so on, he has illustrated with much picturesque and effective scoring. The work was admirably performed, and was received with the utmost enthusiasm by a very large audience.

GLOBE.

The composer has evidently put forth all his strength in setting the fine verses of the poem. . . . His music is always vigorous and full of spirit, and every bar shows the intelligence of a thorough musician. In his setting of the fine lines beginning "Never the lotus closes" Dr. Bridge has succeeded in catching some of the pathos of the poem; this passage was perhaps the best of a work in which, if space allowed, there would be much to praise at length.

ATHENÆUM.

This brief and invigorating cantata, written for soprano solo, chorus and orchestra, will certainly be popular for years, as it is impressive in effect and not by any means difficult, though the music is as varied in style as it is energetic.

SUNDAY TIMES.

Dr. Bridge could have adopted no more fitting model for a work of this description than Stanford's "Revenge," the popularity of which it ought certainly to rival for a time at any rate. The music is full of rhythmical energy, and its tuneful swing catches the ear forthwith.

WEEKLY DISPATCH.

Dr. Bridge's setting of Rudyard Kipling's stirring ballad, "The Flag of England," was an immense success, and the composer was recalled time after time to the orchestra to bow his acknowledgments.

WORLD.

I venture to say that this musical ballad will win wide success, and that the choral societies of the two Isles will fall upon it with one accord. They can't do better.

TRUTH.

Professor Bridge's setting of "The Flag of England" quite roused the Albert Hall audience to enthusiasm.

January 15, 1897.

We, the undersigned Pianoforte Teachers—Professional Musicians—having attended the NORMAL OR TEACHERS' COURSE of the Virgil Piano School, have much pleasure in testifying to the great advantage and utility of the "Clavier" and "Clavier Method" in the teaching and study of the Pianoforte. Having thoroughly tested the System, we are convinced of its excellence, and feel confident that, in making the result of our investigations known, we are rendering a service to Pianoforte Teachers and the Members of the Musical Profession generally who are interested in the true development of the Art of Pianoforte Playing.

THE MUSICAL TIMES
AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.
JULY 1, 1897.

SIR GEORGE CLEMENT MARTIN.

Most heartily do we congratulate Sir George Martin upon the well deserved honour Her Majesty the Queen has been graciously pleased to bestow upon him. The following account of Sir George's career, which was written before he received his knighthood, will now perhaps be read with additional interest.

In a sylvan spot situated in the heart of the great city is the official residence of the organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. Here, in the quiet repose of his study, we are face to face with a man whose life has been one of set purpose, high ideals, and indomitable perseverance, yet characterised throughout with a charming modesty which is becoming all too rare in these bustling times. It is but a few days before the great Jubilee celebration, in which the St. Paul's organist is to play so important a part; yet Dr. Martin narrates his life's story in a perfectly calm and collected manner and absolutely free from affectation. As he relates one incident after another, we cannot fail to be impressed with the thought that his career furnishes a splendid example of "something attempted, something done . . ." and provides a powerful incentive to many an obscure young fellow to be up and doing and to make the most of his opportunities, in the full knowledge that steady, persevering work will, in due time, bring its sure reward.

George Clement Martin was born on September 11, 1844, at Lambourn, Berkshire, an out-of-the-way village which is only now getting its railway station. He cannot boast of a musical pedigree, except that his father sang tenor in the village choir. Curiously enough, he was not a musical boy, though he recalls certain thrills in his childhood, probably when the village church ophicleide, with its huge keys, gave a special sforzando; but he did not sing in the choir. As a matter of fact, he was sixteen years of age before he could play a note. His musical awakening arose in this way. There was a fine Willis organ in the large Parish Church. A certain guest of the Squire's—Sir Herbert Oakeley by name—played some of Bach's fugues on the organ, which so affected and unsettled the boy that music henceforth became the longing of his life. Bach kindled in that young mind the spark which to-day shines as a bright light in our Metropolitan Cathedral. Young Martin immediately set to work, diligently teaching himself. In three months' time "an accident," he calls it—but is there not a "Divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them how we will"?—happened one evening at the Parish Church in the non-appearance of the regular organist. The boy offered to play, and did so, with the result that it was thought that he might take one evening a week. He then took a course of twelve organ lessons from Mr. J. Pearson, who is still living, a pupil of Sir George Elvey's. The first music that young Martin heard outside his native village was at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, when he was struck by the way in which Sir George Elvey played Haydn's "Representation of Chaos." By "a stroke of luck," according to Dr. Martin, a curate fresh from Oxford recommended to the young organist a teacher in the person of Sir John (then Dr.) Stainer, at that time organist at Magdalen College, Oxford. There is almost a tremor in Dr. Martin's voice as he recalls Stainer's unceasing kindness to him. He treated him more as a friend than as a pupil, and—is it not quite characteristic of Sir John's kind-heartedness?—took the greatest interest in the Lambourn boy. Oxford is twenty-two miles from Lambourn, and thither young Martin went on horseback to receive his lessons. He would often get to Magdalen in time for the ten o'clock morning service, and would return home none the worse for his forty-four miles in the saddle. (Bicycles were not then invented.) His lessons with Sir John Stainer were in composition, but one day the Magdalen organist asked him to play the organ, and by way of encouragement, said: "Any fool can walk into the church and criticise your playing who could not pass judgment on your writing." The result was that organ lessons were added to those in composition.

Although Lambourn was "far from the madding crowd," yet its musical atmosphere was well above zero. There was a choral society, conducted by Dr. Martin, who had in the meantime become organist of the Parish Church. Such works as "The Last Judgment," "May Queen," "May Day" were duly performed with orchestral accompaniment, additional help in the band being obtained from Oxford. Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria" was given at Lambourn six weeks after its first London performance. Young Martin came to hear the work at St. James's Hall, and having waited in London till the copies were ready, took them home himself. So enterprising was the zealous conductor that Sullivan's "Prodigal Son" was actually given at Lambourn for the first time after its initial performance at the Worcester Festival. There was also a brass band in the village, and young Martin used regularly to attend the practices. He became familiar with the fingering of the various instruments, and arranged the music for the players, besides filling up any gap as a performer, which proved to be of immense benefit to him in after life when he wrote his well-known services with accompaniments for military bands. In 1869 Dr. Martin took his Mus. Bac. degree at Oxford. His "exercise" needed only to be written for voices and strings, but he scored it for full orchestra, and his willing workers, the Lambourn singers, went to Oxford to sing the "exercise," according to the then requirements, proud to do honour to their distinguished fellow villager. However, Lambourn was not destined to keep so promising a musician.

It happened that a chaplain of the Duke of Buccleuch was staying at Hungerford, who, having heard of "Mr. G. C. Martin, Mus. Bac., Oxon.," reported to His Grace the attainments of the Lambourn organist. Dr. Martin was asked to play before the Duke at St. Peter's, Cranley Gardens (Sir Arthur Sullivan being at that time organist of the church), with the result that he was appointed private organist at Dalkeith Palace. Here he found a daily cathedral service for which he had had no experience—not even as a chorister boy. He doubtless found it a severe task to play "Gibbons in F" in the key of G from an old score copy with soprano clef, but the natural perseverance of the man overcame all such obstacles. During a part of the time he was also organist at St. Peter's Episcopal Church, Edinburgh.

Dr. Martin was "extremely happy" at Dalkeith, and quite expected to end his days there. But one day (in 1873) he received a telegram from his old Oxford master to say that he (Stainer) had been appointed organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. A year later an invitation came to him from Sir John Stainer to come to London as "Master of Song" at St. Paul's Cathedral. This he accepted; thus his first work in London was not as an organist, but to train the St. Paul's boys. However, he occasionally played at the services, and a year later, his chief unfortunately having met with an accident, the Dean and Chapter appointed the "Master of Song" to be acting organist during Sir John Stainer's enforced absence. A gratifying and well-merited acknowledgment of those services came in a "Minute" from the Chapter. On the death of George Cooper, in 1876, Dr. Martin was appointed sub-organist of the Cathedral, and for a short time (in 1883) he was professor of the organ at the Royal College of Music, which appointment he resigned in order to devote all his time and energies to the Cathedral. When Sir John Stainer resigned the organistship of St. Paul's in 1888, it was in the natural order of things that Dr. Martin—who received his doctor's degree from the Archbishop of Canterbury in 1883—should succeed to this important and responsible post. To succeed so eminent, so genial, and so greatly beloved a man as Sir John Stainer needed some courage; but, as all the world knows, Dr. Martin has discharged his duties with conspicuous ability, deserving of the highest praise.

Unlike many young aspirants, Dr. Martin did not rush into print. He waited till he thought he had something to say that was worth saying. The result has fully justified this self-restraint. His published compositions are almost entirely for the Church. Some of the many services by which he is widely known were composed for great festivals held at St. Paul's, and therefore they are scored for orchestra. The Evening Service in B flat is written for military band accompaniment; the short festival setting in G, as well as his anthem "Rejoice in the Lord," have parts for cornets and trombones. We believe Dr. Martin is the first composer to use military instruments on a large scale as an integral and component part of the accompaniments to church music. In this connection it is interesting to recall the village brass band of his Lambourn days, the practical experience of which, Dr. Martin readily admits, has proved to be of invaluable service to him in scoring for the wind instrument orchestra. To the above works having military band accompaniments must now be added the "Short Festival Te Deum (in A) and Antiphon," expressly composed for performance at the Commemoration Service held on the steps of St. Paul's Cathedral on the Diamond Jubilee day, to which we refer elsewhere. We must not forget to add that Dr. Martin has composed at least a dozen anthems, a set of easy Offertory Sentences, also songs and part-songs, amongst the last-named being the charming lullaby "Sleep, darling, sleep," originally composed, as Dr. Martin tells us, for his chorister boys at St. Paul's, and which we trust may soon be published in its original form as well as in the present four-part arrangement.

Dr. Martin's church music is characterised by an impressive earnestness, having an undercurrent of deep religious feeling, which is crowned with a dignified form of expression. He would abhor anything trivial, or any attempt at mere effect at the expense of devotional utterance. The latest, and, we may say, the grandest embodiment of those high principles which underlie Dr. Martin's sacred music is to be found in his recent Communion Service in A, which he has specially scored for full orchestra for the Thanksgiving Service at St. Paul's on the sixtieth anniversary of Her Majesty's Accession. This work is the fruit of Dr. Martin's ripest experience. Modern in treatment, deep in expression, and rich in devotional fervour, we venture to think that this Communion Service marks a new era in English church music.

Long may Sir George Martin be spared to still further enrich our noble heritage of English church song, to enjoy his newly acquired honour and the esteem and regard in which he is so highly and deservedly held.

VICTORIAN MUSIC.

Opera.—II.

Last month I sought to convey some idea of the condition of opera in this country when the Queen's reign began, and also of the events which were then happening in connection with the lyric stage. I ended by saying that, as the survey began with disappointment, with disappointment must it continue. "In no branch of art have we so little progressed during sixty years as in lyric drama." The quoted words are my present text, upon which I intend to discourse in general terms, not having the heart for details which are associated with so much that is humiliating, unedifying, and even inartistic.

If I refer, in the first instance, to foreign opera, it must be understood that I employ a convenient term. The reader scarcely needs to be told that foreign opera includes French and German, as well as Italian, and that occasionally other nationalities contribute to swell its repertory. Save when necessary to distinguish among these various branches, I shall describe them in the mass by a name which, while lumping together diverse and, in certain cases, opposite schools, here best serves a necessary purpose. How then stands it with foreign opera now as compared with sixty years ago? We have already learned from contemporary sources what was doing then; we see with our own eyes what is doing now, and each of us can make the comparison for himself. I presume to do so only in an individual capacity, and as one among many who are at least equally qualified. The popularity of foreign opera—has it increased since the accession of Queen Victoria? Some may object to this question and declare that it never was popular in any true sense of the word. I willingly make the necessary alteration, and ask whether foreign opera is any nearer popularity at present than in past days. What are the signs of growing favour in connection with art? Manifestly, wider practice and increased support. Judged by the test so furnished, foreign opera is in a worse condition now than in 1837, for, albeit we have greater taste, far larger means of gratifying it, and infinitely improved culture, the lyric style is practically non-existent in our great provincial cities—many of which are more populous and wealthy than the capitals of some European States, while in the mighty Metropolis, the "capital of the world," as we sometimes proudly call it, a single theatre is open for opera during ten or twelve weeks in the year, even that much being possible simply because a certain number of fashionable persons desire it, mainly for social reasons. If these fashionables were to change their minds then would England be without foreign opera at all, save for the Carl Rosa Company, and their English versions of alien works. Humiliating? Of course it is, and I, for one, always avoid the subject of opera in presence of the "intelligent foreigner," not wishing to puzzle him with a state of things he cannot possibly understand; nor desirous, on my own part, of blushing for my country more often than, under the circumstances, is unavoidable. It may be said that there are signs of progress in the support given to Wagnerian opera of the latest type. Let no one be deceived. We are only passing through a phase familiar to us who can look back a long way. Wagnerian opera is the latest striking novelty of its kind, and the small minority who really care for the lyric stage are only acting towards it as their predecessors acted in relation to the operas of Rossini, Weber, Meyerbeer, Bellini and Donizetti (bracketted), and Verdi. It is the old story: one cometh and another goeth; he must increase, and I must decrease. I remember how the ascendancy of Verdi—strenuous, passionate, nerve-compelling—struck hard at the softer art of the composers of "La Sonnambula" and "Lucia," and how the ruddy glare of his light paled their ineffectual fires. Let us therefore not build too heavily upon the foundation of Wagner. It may cave in, like the rest, when, as I suppose must happen some time, another composer arises to carry on the tradition. Truly, when we consider that a good thing in art remains always good to the artistic, the fluctuations just pointed out are themselves signs of weakness, as in the very nature of the case must be all indications of the dominance of fashion in a region where nothing essential can change—where that which is fundamentally good and true in one age remains good and true throughout all after time. We do not reject the thoughts of Spenser or Shakespeare because they are clothed in antique verbal garments, neither—though I claim no completeness for the analogy—should we discard the music of past masters with contemptuous references to "powder and peruke"—as though conclusive reasons could be conveyed by epithet.

I have sometimes tried to place myself at the standpoint of those inveterate and astonishing optimists who say, and apparently believe, that nothing is wanting to a demonstration of operatic life but energetic and wise managers. Only open the theatres to lyric drama and we shall see what we shall see. I am no pessimist, hindered by natural disqualifications from reaching the standpoint in question, but, sooth to say, I have never been able to get there. I enquire of the managerial mind, and it answers me with stipulations for guarantees. It takes down and lays before me the operatic wreck chart—a document studded with the fatal crosses which mark disaster and submergence. "Insure my craft," says the managerial mind, "and I will try my luck in those dangerous waters; not otherwise." Of course he will. Managers are not, like British farmers, blind to "openings." There are no shrewder men, and their distrust of opera is the most convincing proof that nothing is to be gained by it. The only grand lyric stage in London at the present moment is run by a syndicate of wealthy and fashionable people, who, for some reason or other, find the exercise gratifying to their feelings. And so we may dismiss foreign opera.

Is it better with opera of home growth—a branch which occasionally, during the Victorian reign, has put forth buds, and, at rare intervals, has struggled into bloom? Alas, no! Sixty years ago English opera kept house with drama, and received its own special friends twice a week or so. Where does it dwell now? Has it a home at all? We know that it is like Noah's first dove in finding no place for the sole of its foot, and unlike in that there is no ark to which it can return. Its friends forsake it. Composers prefer an alliance with the comic muse; publishers and managers shake their heads and shut their doors, and the public are indifferent. Never, perhaps, was the fortune of English opera so low as now. It has contrived to keep above the vanishing point during the Queen's reign, and once, as men of middle age remember, it rose to the occupancy of Covent Garden season after season. But the lease ran out and there was no renewal. At the present moment English opera resembles letter H. in Punch's cockney advertisement. Nobody wants it. Asked to give a reason for all this, one's first impulse is to say that our librettists cannot provide "books," and, if they could, our composers are incompetent to furnish successful music. The charge against librettists may be true, in part, but that against the composers is nonsense, sheer and fatuous. To say that the leading British musicians—I mention no names—are unable to set worthy music to a good book is absurd; but they have scarce any encouragement, or the younger among them only find it in the radiant visions of youth—visions the worth of which their elders know too well. Richly endowed or poverty-stricken, composers can do nothing in the face of public indifference, and of the general impression, oftener acted upon than acknowledged, that operas can be written only by foreign musicians. So it comes about that over the whole field of lyric drama, as seen in this country, we find evidence of decadence steadily progressing, notwithstanding the fact that the press is never weary of proclaiming the importance of opera, of discussing its theory and practice, and gossiping about its artists.

Now, even more than in the earlier decades of the Queen's reign, is it evident that the favour of the scanty numbers who take interest in opera is shown less to a form of art than to artists who have the ability to please. There may be some reason in this, seeing how comparatively few and, therefore, relatively more valuable are the great performers of the present compared with those of the past. Can anyone read the long roll of famous names in the operatic annals of the "thirties" and the "forties" without envy? A manager could then spare two or three "stars" on occasions of illness or obstinacy, and they were scarcely missed from the constellation. Now, if a favourite tenor is sick, the whole establishment goes out of gear, and stop-gap performances are given to a half-empty house. What wonder is it that the public wait upon Mr. Jean de Reszke as upon a demi-god? And yet the press has been preaching the virtue of an ensemble, and writing down the star system for twenty years or more. The press might as well rail at the precession of the equinoxes.

I must ask the thoughtful reader to note that in describing the present state of things I am not dealing with a new or passing phase, but rather with that which is permanent, within the range of limited fluctuations. This is the worst feature of the case. However dark the actual condition, if we could look back upon a brighter time wherein opera, supported by the nation at large, flourished abundantly, there would be ground for hope that as in the past so might it be again. We have no such retrospect. Foreign opera, ever since its introduction in the last century, has been kept alive by the fashionable and wealthy as a social institution, while English opera, not so helped, and being in a sense actually dead, only visits us now and then as a "spook." Where is the promise of better things? With every desire to proclaim its existence, I see none, and I look vainly for some evidence which shall warrant me in crying: "Lo, here!" or "Lo, there!"

Humanity becomes so accustomed to its surroundings, growing into them, so to speak, that it often resents hearing them described as scarcely a legitimate subject of pride. But, in the present case, are not the facts as I have put them? Is it true or untrue that, while in every other art immense strides have been made during the last sixty years, and while other forms of music have progressed in wonderful degree, opera, as an institution, has made no advance whatever. I am not discussing internal changes, or whether Wagnerian music-drama or the works of Bellini be the better. That is another matter. But, as it seems to me, there is no room for diverse opinions within the scope of the question actually put. What is to be done? Have we ground for hoping that, should the Queen's reign endure another ten years, the lyric stage will in her time be placed upon a better footing? This is a far-reaching query, and would take the investigator along lines of thought which might at first seem to run in wrong directions. It would force him to consider the existence of national tendencies in art, the influence of tradition, of historical events, and of the rivalry of arts, even the rivalry of forms of the same art. Ex uno disce omnes does not apply in this case. We cannot reason from the individual to the mass, but must reach the mass through general principles and comprehensive observation, including the entire field of the past.

There may be surprises in the womb of the future, and certainly it is not impossible for the people of this country to show as much appreciation of grand opera as they have long manifested towards the opera called comic. But we must not forget that the two things are very different. Comic opera has its jests and its jokes, its quips and conceits, its puns and verbal points, which have nothing to do with art, yet in conjunction with bright spectacle and pretty faces form the chief attraction. Grand opera wields no such easy power over the multitude, and, on its musical side, appears to be losing the charm of measured vocal melody which all can understand and enjoy. This change may represent an advance in art, and, controlled by the genius of the man to whom it is most owing, may lead to no obvious depreciation of such popularity as the grand lyric stage enjoys amongst us. But a few commanding works do not make a repertory, and when the music-dramas of Wagner have worn out their novelty by use, and the older schools have disappeared under the storm of abuse let loose upon them by advocates of the new, how will opera stand? Shall we have the defects of Wagner, without his merits, from the imitators who follow on the trail of a great man? or will another great man arise to set another fashion and be in turn imitated? In either case there is little hope for opera in England in point of really national support. Permanent and popular changes can only have their origin among the masses of the people, as a conviction of their necessity arises and spreads. Exotic example can do little good. They may become a fashion, and fashion passeth away. There is nothing to be done but wait patiently for developments. Apparently the waiting will be long, since, if there be one thing in art as to which the English people seem indifferent it is grand opera. Among all their clamorous voices none is heard demanding a lyric stage which shall be English and worthy of the name.

FROM MY STUDY.

Personal memoirs and books of reminiscences are an excellent field for literary gleaners, and I have lately diverted myself by going a-leasing among those of older date than the many which have recently sprung up. Before me now lies the "Memoirs and Recollections of the late Abraham Raimbach, Esq., Engraver," edited by M. T. S. Raimbach, M.A., and privately issued in 1843. The name of this engraver, and some of his work, are probably known to the general reader, but it is more to the purpose at this moment that his autobiography contains references to a number of famous musical people. First on the list is Stephen Storace, of whom, says Raimbach, "I had opportunities of seeing a good deal." He adds the following gossip:

"Stephen Storace was the son of an Italian, born in London, and brother to the eminent singer of the Opera House and Drury Lane Theatre, Signora Storace. . . . He died at the age of thirty-three, with a reputation already well established. The music of 'Mahmoud' and of the 'Iron Chest' (the rehearsal of which latter he attended during his last illness, wrapped up in flannel, and carried on the stage in a sedan) was afterwards published by subscription. I lent and lost my copy, presented to me by the widow. Storace in person was of a tall and handsome figure, but his face had suffered considerably from small-pox. His intellectual qualities were by no means confined to his knowledge of music. He was distinguished for acuteness of observation and soundness of judgment. His wit, keenness of perception, and ready fluency of remark rendered him admirable in familiar conversation. His manners, though perfectly gentlemanly, were somewhat haughty, reserved, and unconciliatory with strangers. I engraved his portrait for the title-page of the publication mentioned above from a miniature by Harland (a Swiss), painted after his death, and but little resembling the man himself. Storace, after having overcome the great difficulties that almost every professional man has to encounter before he can emerge from poverty and obscurity, was on the high road to fortune when so prematurely cut off. But, at that time, musical composition was much better remunerated than it appears to be at present. For the music of 'The Haunted Tower,' his first work of importance, he received, I believe, £300 of Longman and Broderip, and for that of 'The Siege of Belgrade' £500, from Dale, a musicseller in Oxford Street, whose daughter was married to Steibelt."

Kelly is but briefly mentioned: "Kelly was an accomplished musician. As a singer he had to struggle against the insurmountable objection of a harsh, unpleasing voice."

Concerning Clementi, Raimbach says:

"Clementi is, I believe, considered by musicians as a genius of a high order and the founder of the modern system of pianoforte music. I heard Pleyel, the German composer, who at that time kept a music-shop in Paris, mention Clementi as a truly great master in his peculiar province. Clementi was well-informed, intelligent, and spoke English almost like a native. John Field, his celebrated pupil, was, when quite a boy, thought to be the finest player in the world. He settled at St. Petersburg, where he died in 1836."

Among the names connected with opera in England, that of Laporte holds a distinguished place, and it is scarcely necessary to state that he for some years presided over the destinies of the King's Theatre, and, for a time, of Covent Garden, where he ultimately came to grief. Raimbach was fond of visiting Paris, and in his Memoirs he discusses French artists with as much zest as he does those on the English stage. Noticing the Vaudeville, he says: "The principal actor at the Vaudeville in 1802 was Laporte, who had obtained a reputation by his performance chiefly of the French harlequin—a very different kind of personage from the nimble gentleman of our Christmas pantomime—whom he resembles only in dress. The English hero is quite silent, and runs about with great activity; the French harlequin, on the contrary, moves but slowly and talks a good deal, and generally outwits his seniors and superiors by a combination of affected simplicity and real cunning." The Laporte mentioned above was the father of the London impresario. Raimbach tells us that he came to London and "played with some effect at the theatre in Tottenham Street, when occupied by a French company under the management of his son, the enterprising lessee of the Opera House." The article on Laporte, the son, in Grove's Dictionary, gives no account of his origin, but states that he first came to England with the troupe which appeared in Tottenham Street.

The "Memoirs of Robert William Elliston, Comedian, by George Raymond, Esq.," 2 vols., 1846, is perhaps hardly read now—certainly not by the Cruickshank collectors, who buy it for the sake of its etchings. But the volumes—my copy is extended to four by extra illustrations—are worth perusal all the same. Elliston was a conspicuous figure in his day; his vocation threw him among all sorts of interesting people, and the pages of his biography are by no means free from references to music and musicians. Some of these may interest the reader.

My first choice concerns a certain Desborough, who kept a so-called club in Wych Street—one of a number which flourished near the theatres and were chiefly frequented, according to Mr. Raymond, by "a class of persons who had but one plan in life, which was to give over work the first moment they had earned enough to get drunk for the remainder of the day." The revels at the Court of Comus, as Desborough's club was called, were not elevating; but we are here concerned only with the fact that Desborough was famous for singing Dibdin's song "Fortune's Wheel." "A dull rogue on most points," he had on one "a kind of concentration of genius, the light whereof became more vivid by the illimitable stupidity by which it was encircled." We read, further: "Stupid Desborough was, indeed, so far before all rivalry in this song that Charles Dibdin actually sought him out, with another tap-room Apollo, known as Dick Mason, to give him assistance in his musical olios." Mr. Raymond calls this faculty of doing one thing supremely well "a sort of monophlox." I remember a case. In the far-away days when I was a choirboy, there came to our organist, one practice night, a stranger who talked largely and loftily about things musical in general, and organs in particular. The impression conveyed by his speech and bearing was that a very great man had dropped among us, nor was this idea dispelled when, accepting a courteous invitation to try the instrument before him, he perched on the stool, drew out the stops, and played a short piece, which I have forgotten, with a majesty of style and perfection of legato such as made us all wonder and admire. But he could do nothing else, and only after much pressing did our organist succeed in getting him to try. Out of the saddle of his one cheval de bataille he showed himself to be a mere fumbler at whom even the youngest boys smiled derisively. It was another case of "Fortune's Wheel" and Desborough of Wych Street.

Steele, writing in the Guardian, supplies another example of monophlox. He mentions that an actor, William Peer, owes the preservation of his memory to the fact that he played only one part, and did that well. It was the actor in "Hamlet," and Peer's distinction arose from his delivery of three lines:

> For us and for our tragedy,
> Here stooping to your clemency,
> We beg your hearing patiently.

The essayist adds: "His whole action in life depended on his speaking these three lines, which he did better than any man else in the world." Instances of a similar kind are not wanting. Ward, leader of the band at the Manchester Theatre, once jumped on the stage and performed, "with admirable skill," the part of an actor who had suddenly been taken ill. This encouraged him to hang up his fiddle and put on sock and buskin, but he failed miserably in every other character than the one first assumed. There is the like case of Woodham, a trumpeter at Covent Garden, who, on the sudden indisposition of Braham, volunteered to replace the great artist and did so with remarkable effect. But he never achieved anything else even tolerably well. All this is very curious and might repay the attention of psychological students.

Our author repeats a story of Tom Cooke, at one time famous as an "infant phenomenon." Giordani had written a song for Mrs. Billington, designed to show the unusual compass of her voice. When rehearsing this, one of her high notes was so exactly imitated by Cooke, then a boy in the orchestra, that the artist's attention was attracted. "She immediately sent for the lad, and requested him to repeat the offence, and this he not only did, but aggravated the matter by a still higher flight, which the siren herself afterwards attempting could not attain. Mrs. Billington was, indeed, surprised, but not out of her generosity, for she was as pleased as little Tom himself, who, rewarded by a crown, went away as happy as a king."

Mrs. Bland, the famous ballad-singer, is the subject of two stories. Her maiden name was Romanzini, her parents being Hebrews resident in Liverpool, where the talent of the budding singer made her a great favourite. "The mother of our vocalist, for the purpose of persuading the inhabitants of Liverpool that her daughter was not of Judah, compelled her to sit at her open window on every Saturday, occupied in needlework; and, in addition to this, she was usually sent by the politic parent into the public market to buy a pig, and was compelled to carry it home herself, to give further confirmation as to this desirable point. To such an extent did the mother employ this sort of evidence that, in the instance of her daughter taking a benefit, an advertisement announced that tickets were to be had at Miss Romanzini's residence, and also at a pork-butcher's near the market." The second Bland story is gruesome. Driving home from the theatre one evening, the artist was puzzled by the course of the vehicle, which went hither and thither, sometimes returning to points which had before been passed, and so on. She called to the coachman, but he gave no heed. Alarmed at this, Mrs. Bland began to scream; the carriage was stopped and the driver found dead.

The first appearance of Madame Vestris is thus noted: "On Saturday, the 19th February, Madame Vestris made her entrée on the English stage, at Drury Lane, in the part of Lilla in the 'Siege of Belgrade.' This lady was introduced by Corri. For the first few nights, Madame Vestris did not appear to make any great impression on the audience, but, before the end of the season, she acquired the popularity which she has since maintained undiminished."

Of Dignum it is said that he was "the first of the vocalists who started that trading scheme which has since proved so lucrative and agreeable to his fraternity—namely, singing for hire at public dinners. Dignum has been frequently known, at the Freemasons' Tavern, to eat two dinners, sing half-a-dozen songs, drink twice as many bumpers, and be well paid for the whole miscellaneous duties—a converse bit of fortune which, until his day, had fallen to the lot but of very few."

In Elliston's day, as often since, trouble was caused in theatrical orchestras by the absence of principal performers and the presence of deputies. Here is an anonymous letter sent from the lower ranks of the Drury Lane orchestra to the omnipotent manager, Elliston himself:

"If you look into the orchestra to-night you will find our first bassoon and clarinet gone to the Philharmonic concert, and others upon the slip every night. So, for the sake of eight nights at the Philharmonic, the theatre that employs them nine months is neglected. They think you cannot do without them, but they are very much mistaken—you do do without them, because they are not there. You need only go to the Coburg Theatre and you will hear a clarinet and bassoon equal, if not superior to ours, and a drum-player who would beat ours hollow. They thought you could not do without old Hervey's oboe, but we have a man now whose tone is as much superior to Hervey's as a trumpet to a penny whistle. Sir, go to the Coburg and hear for yourself."

This letter is signed "Never Away," but it seems pretty clear that he was never away for lack of temptation.

Elliston at one time engaged Madame Catalani for Drury Lane, on the sharing system. This was satisfactory awhile, but when the lady's portion dropped below £10 troubles began. The money was taken to her every morning by a messenger from the theatre. "Arriving in Pall Mall, the emissary announced the ignoble amount—£9 6s.—to Catalani's footman, who was either so ashamed of it, or fearing he might be charged with embezzlement, actually refused to carry it to his mistress. The messenger was therefore compelled himself to proceed upstairs. Madame Catalani happened, at this moment, to be surrounded by a little circle of visitors, before whom the account stated was produced. This maladroit proceeding so thoroughly disconcerted her that she sang no more at Drury Lane Theatre."

Our author gives what he styles a "literal copy" of a card which was invariably transcribed for Madame Catalani when she had to sing "God save the King."

Oh Lord avar God
Arais schaeter
Is enimis and Mece them fol
Confond tear
Politekse frosstre
Thear nevise trix
On George avar hopes
We fix God save the Kin.

This card appears to be still in use at Covent Garden when the National Anthem is sung.

Elliston had the credit of first presenting "Der Freyschütz" in England as Weber wrote it, but he lost the distinction of first making the work known here. "Der Freyschütz," we are told, was brought to this country in 1824 by Brockenden, the artist, who handed it to his friend at Drury Lane. On examination it was declared unfit for the stage, and abandoned. This let in Arnold, of the Lyceum, who produced the work after a fashion, styling it "an eccentric vehicle for music and scenic effect." The eccentric vehicle ran, however, for forty-three nights, and for fifty at the Garden in 1825. At the Lyceum, Bennett played Caspar, and, as he could not sing, Henry Phillips, then a member of the chorus, delivered the music of the part, standing at the wing, while Bennett gesticulated on the stage. Elliston made a great hit with his original version of the favourite opera; the incantation scene far exceeding anything that had been witnessed on the stage. "The gradual increase of terrific objects in various directions, and the horrific abruption, in which two gigantic figures (admirably conceived by Stanfield) rose to the whole height of the stage, formed a phantasma never surpassed in the history of dramatic mechanism."

In 1825 a young violinist, Master Balfe, was introduced at Drury Lane by Charles Horn. He is described as "a wild, ungovernable lad, but a special favourite with all his acquaintances." That he was an impudent lad appears from the following note, addressed by him to his manager:

"Master Balfe requests it as a favour that Mr. Elliston will send him his discharge to-night, as he does not intend to enter the theatre again. If Mr. Elliston wishes to know the reason, it is because Master Balfe will not play until his week's salary is paid; if Mr. Elliston will send him his discharge, in writing, Master Balfe will thank him, and if not, Master Balfe, being under age, begs leave to let Mr. Elliston know that he will not, until forced, go into the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane."

Hoity-toity! fetch the birch, somebody.

The name of John Ashley has before figured in these papers as a conductor of the Covent Garden oratorios. Our author informs us that he always kept his gold in his own house, shifting its hiding-place from room to room, and carrying the key of his strong box wherever he went. On one occasion, at Covent Garden, Ashley had an epileptic fit. His first words on regaining consciousness were, "In the name of Heaven, tell me what sort of a house it is!"

X.

THE ART OF APPLAUSE.

The habit of audibly testifying approval of a musical performance is probably as old as the days of the cave-men. And yet as an art, in spite of the ingenuity of the French, it is still in its infancy. Into the history and development of the claque—an extremely interesting subject—we do not propose to enter at the moment, beyond making a passing reference to that splendid tour de force of a Parisian chief of the claque, who hired two one-armed men to simulate enthusiasm independently, and then, as by a happy inspiration, to join forces in a co-operative hand-clap. But with venal approval of this sort we are not now concerned. Rather is it our intention to dwell on some of the recent developments of the art as practised by the amateur, and to point out in what direction there is room for improvement. And when we talk of the development of applause, there is one striking change which persons even of a middle age cannot have failed to notice. We refer to the participation of women in demonstrations of this sort. Thirty years ago it was hardly "good form" for a lady to applaud. She allowed her brothers or sons or husband to express her approval vicariously. But emancipation and the athletic education of our Amazons have changed all that. In applause nowadays, as in everything else, dux femina facti, and when a Paderewski plays lovely woman does not merely clap her lily-white hands, but she stamps her fairy feet and thumps on the floor with her elegant parasol or en-tout-cas. And certainly musicians are not likely to resent the innovation, for they would scout as a counsel of perfection the maxim that "virtuosity is its own reward." No; it may be a sign of weakness, but musicians, when they perform in public, like to be applauded, and as fully three-fourths of the tribe of concert-goers are of the fair sex, it is just as well, in the interest of the performer, that women should have abandoned their old prejudice against testifying their approval in the way practised by the mere male person.

If, however, the mere dynamic volume of applause has gained by the innovation just alluded to, it cannot be said that there is a corresponding improvement in its æsthetic value. No one, for example, who is in the habit of attending our great choral concerts can have failed to notice the fact that in expressing approval of the efforts of the soloists, the lead is commonly taken by the chorus and not by the audience. This undoubtedly shows a very nice feeling, but it augurs a certain want of lucidity on the part of the chorus. Identified as they are with the performing section of the assemblage, they ought certainly to abstain from expressing their satisfaction until they have received the sanction of the audience, and we would therefore suggest to conductors that they should make it a rule that no applause should be permitted from the members of the chorus until a singer has been recalled, or rises to make a second acknowledgment. This is our first counsel of perfection. The second is that some severe penalty—say fourteen days' imprisonment without the option of a fine—should be inflicted on those gentlemen who insist on bursting out in the middle of a song or an instrumental solo with strident shouts of "Bra! Bra!" the second syllable being quite inaudible. This peculiar noise, though ostensibly intended to express delight, is much more suggestive of the wrath or indignation of an infuriated gorilla. It must be exceedingly bad for the vocal chords of the individual who emits it, and one would think that it must prove most disconcerting to the performer. It is, we take it, a survival of the Italian tyranny in matters musical, and is regarded as a proof of linguistic accomplishment, much in the same way that a Cockney sportsman on a curling rink thinks it de rigueur to assume a broad Scotch accent. But whatever its origin or aim, it is not only hideous in itself, but it materially affects the equanimity of the genuine music-lover, and on either of these grounds clamours for instant suppression. In this context we may, perhaps, be allowed to protest against the applauder who, by way of advertising his discrimination, elevates his hands to the level of his head and claps at the performer as though he were saying, "Never mind what this ignorant mob think of your efforts. You know what a highly-cultivated person I am, and here am I, your friend, nobly recognising your talents at the expense of my gloves." The affectation of the elevated hand-clap is as odious as that of the high hand-shake, and under an enlightened despot would have been probably punished by the amputation of at least one hand.

A much more serious ground for dissatisfaction with our method of expressing approval is its inherent inadequacy. For example, it often happens that the most appreciative and highly cultivated section of an audience is desirous, in the best interests of the performer, of checking the inopportune and disconcerting manifestations of delight of the less discriminating portion. If, however, they cry "sh, sh," the sound is practically indistinguishable from a hiss, and they are accordingly liable to incur the imputation of discourtesy when, as a matter of fact, they are animated by an entirely different feeling. This is only one instance out of many which will readily occur to our readers of the inadequacy of the means which are at the disposal of the auditor of expressing his approval (or the reverse) of the efforts of public performers. We throw out these few hints in the hope that some inventive person may draw up a code of signals—audible or otherwise—which may supplement the meagreness and inefficiency of the method at present in vogue.

KASHKINE'S RECOLLECTIONS OF TSCHAÏKOWSKY.

Since the year 1863 a Musical Society had existed in Moscow, for which Nicolas (brother of Anton) Rubinstein undertook the harmony lessons; but the time at his disposal was so limited that, when the opening of a Conservatoire in 1866 was under discussion, it became imperative to find another teacher. Piotr Iliyitch Tschaïkowsky, a pupil of the St. Petersburg Conservatoire, was appointed, and entered upon his duties early in January, 1866, being offered fifty roubles a month (five pounds sterling at present rate of exchange) until the opening of the Moscow Conservatoire in the following September: this was a low salary even for those days, when living was far cheaper than now. Nicolas Rubinstein proposed that Tschaïkowsky should instal himself with him, and it was here that Professor Kashkine met him for the first time; they dined together on the evening of their introduction, and finding that they had many tastes in common—particularly music and literature—they soon became intimate friends.

As a master Tschaïkowsky was a great favourite; yet, having no inclination for teaching, he always considered himself unsuited for it, an opinion which was, however, erroneous. A Concert-Overture in F minor, re-written for large orchestra, was his first work performed in Moscow; though not a brilliant success, it attracted the attention of musicians, and even this small modicum of praise pleased the composer, as so little help or encouragement had hitherto fallen to his share.

Tschaïkowsky's amiable disposition soon made him popular and brought him many invitations, which he seldom accepted, as he preferred to spend his evenings quietly. The Cercle Artistique was then the centre where writers, actors, musicians, and all interested in art and literature congregated, and here he met Ostrovski the play-writer, who offered to compose the libretto for his opera "The Voïévode"; however, two years later Tschaïkowsky himself, with Ostrovski's sanction, finished the libretto. Tschaïkowsky shared rooms with Nicholas Rubinstein next door to the Conservatoire. The arrangement was in some ways inconvenient, but Nicholas Rubinstein soon recognised in Tschaïkowsky a great composer, and, but for the co-operation of such a friend and artist, he would not have become so speedily celebrated. Only death put an end to this mutual attachment.

During the years 1866-1867 Tschaïkowsky devoted himself to his opera "The Voïévode" and to the revision of his symphony "Winter Reveries." He likewise wrote the pianoforte piece "Scherzo à la Russe," which, together with an Impromptu, were then published as Op. 1; this was his first appearance in print, if we except the first half of a collection of fifty Russian National Songs, arranged for pianoforte for four hands. In the summer he left for the Baltic, staying principally at Hapsal, and there wrote his Manual of Harmony, the value of which lay in its simplicity, clearness of statement, and practical selection of exercises. In this year he made the acquaintance of Madame Artôt, dedicating to her his Romance sans Paroles in F minor (Op. 5), which acquired great popularity. Towards the end of the season 1867-1868 it was proposed that he should personally conduct some dances of his own composition.

Fortunately the orchestra, who knew them well, paid no attention to the erratic signs of Tschaïkowsky, who quite lost his head from nervousness. And yet he subsequently became a well-known conductor, travelling with his compositions and baton through various parts of Europe; but to the end of his life each concert he conducted cost him physical suffering. Tschaïkowsky's first real success was his symphony "Winter Reveries," which, though refused in St. Petersburg, met with warm applause in Moscow.

The opera "The Voïévode" was quite completed during the summer of 1868 and its performance discussed. At this period Moscow Society interested itself solely in the Italian opera and the ballet, looking upon a Russian production with indifference and contempt. At the first representation, though the actual music satisfied the public, yet the scenic action pleased little. The libretto, with its conventional dryness, was without effect, and the music, though very clever, was not distinguished by sustained style or maturity. Tschaïkowsky at once felt that the success was merely temporary, and subsequently burnt the score. The year 1869 was an unfortunate one for him. His great Orchestral Fantasia, "Fatum," was given at a concert in February with moderate success, and the composer afterwards destroyed this score also. The musical critic Balakirev wrote a cruelly critical article thereon, for though he was personally fond of the composer, he held opposite musical views.

Not having devoted himself to serious musical study till comparatively late in life, Tschaïkowsky had not that grasp of the subject possessed by those who have lived amidst musical surroundings from childhood. He was obliged to acquire by hard work, and by study of musical literature, the knowledge and sympathy which would then have been natural to him. In 1871 he wished to go abroad, but as his funds did not permit, Nicolas Rubinstein proposed a concert, to consist solely of his (Tschaïkowsky's) own compositions. For this concert he wrote a String Quartet in D (Op. 11), the Andante of which has since acquired world-wide renown. The Russian song, forming the first theme, was written down from the voice of a plasterer who had awakened him with his singing on several consecutive mornings. The proceeds of the concert enabled Tschaïkowsky to leave Russia.

He had ceased to live with Rubinstein from September, 1870, to the former's great grief. At this period he was much captivated by one of the lady singers of the Italian Opera, and it seems that a marriage had been arranged. However, the opera company left Moscow, staying several days in Warsaw, whence a telegram announced the lady's marriage to another member of the company. Tschaïkowsky seemed more surprised than hurt at the news. He subsequently met the lady abroad; they became great friends—he was a warm admirer of her talents and intellect—but no shadow of any other feeling revived.

In 1871 it was arranged to celebrate, in the following year, Peter the Great's two hundredth anniversary by an Exhibition, to be called the Polytechnical Exhibition. Moscow entered into the realisation of the project with great energy and Tschaïkowsky was offered 750 roubles for a cantata for the opening of the Exhibition. It was composed, performed, and never heard of again, though some traces of it can be recognised in the Third Symphony in D major. The opera "Opritchnik" ("The Lifeguardsman") took Tschaïkowsky a year to write. It was only given in the spring of 1874, by which time the author's enthusiasm had cooled, and he was disappointed with his work. After the first representation he started for Naples on the money he had received.

In 1872 he entered a competition for the composition of a Russian opera, to be written to Polonski's libretto "Vakoula, the Smith," and both the first and second prizes were awarded him. The opera was given at Moscow in 1876 but was not a complete success. Between "The Lifeguardsman" and "Vakoula, the Smith," he had composed his second Symphony in C minor, which may be called "The Little Russian," as the beginning and the Finale are written on small Russian themes; this was much appreciated both in St. Petersburg and Moscow. In 1873 he composed a Fantasia on Shakespeare's "Tempest," which was well received.

It was apparently at the beginning of 1874 that Tschaïkowsky's Quartet in F major was performed for the first time in Nicolas Rubinstein's rooms. Anton Rubinstein was present, and after listening with signs of disapprobation, he announced in his usual pitiless outspoken manner that the style was not that of chamber music, that he could not understand the composition in the least, and so on. Tschaïkowsky was probably much hurt at this cruel criticism, though it did not lessen his warm attachment to his master. When, two years later, Anton Rubinstein dedicated one of his pianoforte pieces to Tschaïkowsky, his pupil, the latter was delighted, and immediately reciprocated this mark of attention by dedicating six pieces on one theme (Op. 21) to his friend and master. Yet he received neither answer nor acknowledgment, and Anton never played any of his pupil's compositions.

Tschaïkowsky occasionally wrote for the press, but he did not care much for the work. He had no literary pretensions, and merely spoke out his opinion fearlessly on any musical novelty; but he gave up writing when he found that the defence or condemnation of musical subjects led to recriminations and personalities.

In 1875 he offered the score of his Concerto in

B flat minor to Nicolas Rubinstein, inscribing a dedication on the title-page. Nicolas found fault with everything in it, and finally demanded that the whole should be revised. His cutting remarks roused Tschaïkowsky's anger, who decided that the Concerto should be printed without the alteration of a single note. Only the dedication was changed, and Hans von Bülow's name substituted for that of Nicolas Rubinstein's. Bülow, who was just starting for America, played it at Boston with brilliant success.

Tschaïkowsky was a constant and unwearied worker, yet his duties at the Conservatoire weighed more and more heavily upon him. A curious fact came to light there, witnessing to the difference in the capabilities of the two sexes. Both worked side by side in the class-rooms, and in the lower grades—elementary theory and the first harmony course, in which attention and exactitude are the chief requisites—those who stood highest were the women; whereas in the second harmony course, where pupils must exhibit a certain independence in their work, the men triumphed. As this happened regularly every year, it strengthened the young professor in his suppositions as to the capabilities of women in music.

Tschaïkowsky's ballet music, "The Swan Lake," never achieved the popularity he had hoped for. During March and April, 1875, he went abroad by his doctor's advice, with orders never to touch the pianoforte nor to take up a piece of music paper. On his return he played to his friends a String Quartet in E flat minor, composed on the death of an intimate friend. His third Symphony in D major was written the same year, and he wrote a series of twelve compositions for pianoforte, called "The Seasons of the Year"—each piece composed at one sitting—for the editor of a musical paper, which met with enormous success both at home and abroad. His "Slavonic" March was likewise received with enthusiasm. The last important compositions, written in Moscow, were the Symphonic Poem "Francesca da Rimini," the outline of his fourth Symphony in F minor, and a new work which banished all others from his head—an opera on Poushkine's poem "Eugène Oniéguine."

Probably at this period he was already engaged to be married, but in any case he kept it a profound secret. Kashkine separated from him after the Conservatoire examinations, and only heard of his marriage in August. Soon afterwards he met the young people at an evening party given by a mutual acquaintance; but he never went to see them in their new abode, having no special invitation to do so, and the marriage remained to him, as to all others, an enigma. During 1877-78 Tschaïkowsky visited Clareno, Italy, Vienna, &c., and was busy upon his opera and a symphony already begun, and, though terribly depressed, he composed a Russian Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom for four voices, a fourth Symphony in F minor, many small pianoforte and violin pieces, songs, &c.

In the spring of 1878 he returned to Russia, and resumed his duties at the Moscow Conservatoire at the beginning of August. He remained there a very short time, and then severed himself for ever from professorial duties, which had become distasteful and were no longer necessary, in order to devote himself entirely to the more congenial task of composition. He soon left for Paris, a city sufficiently large for him to be able to isolate himself without attracting public notice.

At the first public performance of "Eugène Oniéguine" in Moscow, in 1879, many friends came from St. Petersburg, and in some of the boxes people stood fifteen deep; yet it cannot be said that the opera was a real success. The audience was chiefly composed of amateurs, who, while quite capable of criticising the divergence of the libretto from Poushkine's poem, were not thorough enough musicians to appreciate the music. The opera was put on the stage of the Imperial Theatre in 1880.

From 1879 Kashkine saw little of Tschaïkowsky, and they only corresponded on urgent topics. Tschaïkowsky wrote "The Maid of Orleans" while abroad, chiefly at Clarens, during the winter months of 1879-1880. His last great works performed by Nicolas Rubinstein were the first Suite for orchestra (Op. 43), the Italian Caprice (Op. 45), also for orchestra, and a long Sonata for pianoforte in G (Op. 37). On playing the latter to the composer, Rubinstein subsequently remarked that he had diverged from some of the directions as to the time and expression; to which Tschaïkowsky replied with conviction: "Play it your own way, my dear fellow—it is certainly better than mine—besides, what do I know of such matters?"

Such confidences as this he bestowed only upon Nicolas Rubinstein and Hans von Bülow. On March 11, 1881, Nicolas Rubinstein died in Paris. Tschaïkowsky was then abroad, and both he and Anton Rubinstein arrived too late. Tschaïkowsky devoted nearly the whole of the year 1881 to a Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, in A minor, dedicated "to the memory of a great artist," and dated Rome, January, 1882; it is a worthy memorial to artist and friend, colossal both in design and execution. During 1882-1883 he composed the opera "Mazeppa," receiving an ovation on its production, and yet it was no real success. In 1884 he wrote his third orchestral suite, "Grankino" (Op. 55).

Tschaïkowsky was living at the village of Maïdanov in 1885, where his intimate Conservatoire friends visited him. Kashkine's tastes were so similar to his own that he was no unwelcome guest. From Maïdanov, Tschaïkowsky removed to Frohlovsk, and invited several members of the Conservatoire to stay with him there in order to hear his just completed opera "The Queen of Spades," the rough draft of which had been written at Florence in six weeks. Here he also composed, in 1891, a string sextet.

Tschaïkowsky aged much in appearance as he neared his fifties; his scant hairs grew quite white, and his face lined. The works of other composers interested him much; he long carried about with him the score of Rimski Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice." This composition was once to be performed at a Concert, when it suddenly occurred to the conductor that there was no one to play the castanets. Tschaïkowsky forthwith volunteered his services. "Well, look here, Piotr Iliyitch," said the conductor, "don't you count the bars wrongly and come in at the wrong place." "Surely you don't take me for such an ass, as not to be able to come in at the proper time, with the score in my hand!" said Tschaïkowsky with displeasure. Yet he did so through nervousness, amidst much laughter.

About four years before his death Tschaïkowsky tried spending a winter in Moscow; but, being unable to stand the constant interruptions of a town life, he left for Italy. During the later years of his life he did not care to remain abroad for long, and though he had contemplated settling in Paris with a friend, he changed his mind after three days' sojourn and returned to country life in Russia. In the spring of 1893 he visited England to receive the degree of Doctor of Music at Cambridge University, and spoke with much feeling of the hospitality he had received in England; he was greatly charmed by the intellect and cultivation of Arrigo Boïto, one of his colleagues in honours on that occasion.

Kashkine went abroad in 1893, and before his return Tschaïkowsky had already left for Hamburg, staying there only six days for the performance of his opera "Iolanthe." During a three days' visit to Moscow, in October, he and Kashkine were present at a dinner, and the same evening Tschaïkowsky left for St. Petersburg to conduct his sixth (Pathetic) Symphony; both agreeing to meet at a concert in Moscow on October 23. It was at this very concert that Kashkine was informed of Tschaïkowsky's illness, and, on the 25th, he learnt that his beloved friend had died of cholera. He left the same day for St. Petersburg, only to find the coffin already closed. Professor Kashkine can see no connection between the Pathetic Symphony and Tschaïkowsky's death; for Tschaïkowsky was then busy with plans for the future, and without any premeditation of death. He wished to lengthen his days in this world as much as possible, the chief charms of which were to him his own inner life and the enjoyment of out-door nature—his love of which amounted well-nigh to adoration.

We beg to offer our cordial congratulations to Sir John Frederick Bridge upon the honour of knighthood, which Her Majesty the Queen has been graciously pleased to confer upon him. We hope to give a biographical sketch of the Westminster Abbey organist in our next issue.

The following letter, on the subject of Dean Hole's altered version of the National Anthem, has been communicated to the Press.

"GOD SAVE THE QUEEN."

Sir,—A very strong wish has been universally expressed that the second verse of "God save the Queen," as amended by the Very Rev. S. Reynolds Hole, Dean of Rochester, should be generally adopted and thus permanently become a portion of our National Anthem.

As this desirable result could not be fully achieved so long as the copyright of the verse remained in private hands, we venture to ask you to allow us to announce, through the medium of your columns, that from to-morrow, the day on which Her Majesty completes the sixtieth year of her glorious reign, Dean Hole's lines are free to the nation and may be printed and published by anyone.

It is a matter of sincere gratification to us that we were so fortunate as to induce the Dean of Rochester to write the new verse, and this gratification will be immeasurably increased if the Dean's admirable lines become permanently associated with "God save the Queen."

We are, your obedient Servants,

June 19, 1897. Novello and Co.

As much criticism has been passed upon this new version of "God save the Queen," no apology is needed for reprinting Dean Hole's genial letter on the subject, addressed to The Times:—

"GOD SAVE THE QUEEN."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE TIMES."

Sir,—Will you kindly allow me to state, in reply to many critics, scornful and sympathetic, that my only motive in altering, at the request of Dr. Bridge and Messrs. Novello, the second verse of our National Anthem was this—that something more appropriate to public worship than

Confound their politics,
Frustrate their knavish tricks,

might be sung in the churches?

Outside, I am ever willing to join in the old version, lustily and with a good courage, upon the understanding, of course, that all politics are to be confounded except my own, and that they only are capable of knavish tricks who differ from

Yours faithfully,

S. Reynolds Hole.

The Deanery, Rochester, June 21.

Dr. E. J. Hopkins has in a forward state of preparation a new handbook on the history and mechanism of the organ. The nucleus of the work is the valuable article "Organ," contributed by him to Sir George Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," together with a paper on "The English Mediæval Church Organ," read before the Royal Archæological Institute. The main features of the book will consist of—(1) the ancient history, (2) the mediæval history, and (3) the modern description (brought up to the present time) of the organ. In prosecuting the necessary researches for the work, Dr. Hopkins has discovered that much that has hitherto been considered to be "history" is in reality both unreliable and misleading. He is, therefore, sparing no pains to make his book not only trustworthy, but thoroughly interesting and practical —in fact, it will be a comprehensive handbook on the "King of Instruments" of the greatest possible value to every organist. "The History of the Organ" will not only be profusely illustrated, but, being a much smaller volume than the great work on the subject by Dr. Hopkins, it will be issued at a popular price. Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. are the publishers.

"He was a master of ironical wit, and many stories are current of his pungent remarks when expressing his opinions, which were as outspoken as they were amusing." These words formed part of the obituary notice of the late Mr. W. T. Best in our last issue. We now propose to furnish a few specimens of the humour above referred to, derived from authentic documents and personal information.

About twenty years ago Mr. Best visited a large new church in London to "try" the fine organ which had been erected therein. While the tuners were "making ready," the distinguished performer, looking up to the lofty roof, remarked to the organist of the church: "This is a fine church," and then noticing that some masons were carving the capitals of the pillars, he added, gently rubbing his hands: "Were there a great many souls waiting to be saved in this district that it was necessary to open this church before it was finished?" At an important concert at the Royal Albert Hall, at which he officiated as organist, a request was brought to him that he should play something while the chorus were re-assembling for the second part of the performance. Turning to a favoured friend in the organ loft, Best begged the loan of a knife and pencil. With similar appliances from his own pocket, he wedged down four notes forming the common chord of C. An endless varying of the chord by the manipulation of the stops formed this chorus-assembling voluntary, which is worthy to rank with S. S. Wesley's chord of C minor at Winchester when the judges marched up the nave of the Cathedral. An instance of Best's ready wit is recorded in connection with the opening of an organ at a Presbyterian Church in London, for which he had provided a somewhat dry programme. During the progress of a long fugue by Bach, one of the "powers that be" sent a message to the eminent organist containing the request that he would play the "Green Hill." Best at once said: "Would the gentleman like me to play the 'Blue Alsatian Mountains'?"

The following letters are eminently characteristic of the man. Writing to the late Mr. A. G. Kurtz, a well-known Liverpool amateur, in 1863, Mr. Best said: "I am obliged by your note, and shall be happy to conduct my 'March,' from which you must not expect much, as it is not out of the ordinary way of such compositions. I suppose I must purchase a ticket for Mrs. Best when it is played. I shall be at the organ at the Church for the Blind for two or three Sunday mornings yet, and am glad you liked my style of 'leading the blind.'" Soon after the death of Sterndale Bennett, in 1875, whereby the professorship of music at Cambridge became vacant, Best wrote to a distinguished brother organist at one of the cathedrals in the following quaint terms: "Dear ——, The Cambridge people say I am the right man to counteract Ouseley in making Music Doctors in gangs of 50 at a time.—Just sent my carte de visite, and am recommending myself. Give me your prayers, my hearty."

In an interesting communication, dated September 15, 1894, on the subject of the introduction of Mendelssohn's organ music into England, Best wrote: "I well remember that we young organ players at that time [1845] were quite scandalised at the apathy manifested by T. Adams and others in giving these works a hearing, sheltering themselves by the old 'G G' pedal-board, which of course was common to all organists, old and young, then, and only required a new 'C C pedal clavier' to replace it, and render Bach's, Mendelssohn's, and other organ works immediately feasible. We of the younger generation had this speedily done. Adams, with enormous contrapuntal talent, regaled himself by serving up one or two of Bach's '48,' adding a droning pedal when his bunions were propitious."

In reply to an enquiry as to the exact date of the late Mr. W. T. Best's appointment as organist of Lincoln's Inn Chapel, Dr. Steggall, who has held the office for the last thirty-three years, kindly sends us the following information: "I have always understood that, before the appointment of Pittman by the Benchers, they arranged with J. Alfred Novello to provide the music for the chapel; he would, therefore, engage both organist and singers. This, no doubt, accounts for there being no notice in the books of Best's appointment."

The American musical critic will have to "sit up." At the convention of the Music Teachers' Association, which was to be held in New York from June 24-28, one of the subjects for discussion was "Musical Journalism." The chairman of the meeting, anxious to secure an expression of opinion from some of the leading American newspapers on "musical criticism," sent out the following schedule of questions: (1) "Does the supply of expert musical criticism equal the demand?" (2) Do you believe that intelligent musical criticism in the daily press would have a direct influence on the public taste in musical matters?" (3) Do you believe that it is possible to train critics in this field as other professionals are trained—by a college or conservatory course of education?" (4) "Do you believe that there is a public demand for musical criticism in the smaller cities of the United States?" These pertinent questions seem to imply that the American musical critic has been "found wanting." Some such queries might without irrelevance be put on this side of the "pond." In regard to No. 3, supposing classes were to be formed for the training of professional musical critics at the Royal Academy of Music, the Royal College of Music, and the Guildhall School of Music, who would be the first professors?

An American tribute to the excellence of English fac-simile reproduction has been paid in a somewhat curious way. An order for a copy of "The History of Mendelssohn's oratorio 'Elijah,'" sent to Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.'s New York house, was duly executed and forwarded by "Book post." The recipient of the book was surprised to find that the New York Post Office had surcharged the packet "Letter rate," because it contained a letter. The local postmaster, upon being appealed to, was convinced that the New York officials had made a mistake. As a matter of fact, they had taken the fac-simile of Mendelssohn's long epistle to Mr. Bartholomew (which appears at the end of the book) to be the actual autograph letter!

The German press, as was to be expected, has been teeming with reminiscences of the late Johannes Brahms, both as regards his personality and various incidents in his career. Dr. Wüllner, of Cologne, one of the earliest and most enthusiastic admirers of the master, in an address delivered by him on the occasion of a commemorative performance given on the 2nd ult. at the Conservatorium of which he is the director, says, inter alia: "With joy and emotion do I look back upon the time when I made Brahms's acquaintance. It was in the summer of 1853. I was staying at the time at Honnef, in constant intercourse with the Bonn musicians Wasielewski and Reimers, and with the hospitable Deichmann family of Mehlem, where we frequently extemporised little musical performances. One day the excellent violoncellist, Reimers, came to me at Honnef and insisted upon my at once accompanying him to Mehlem, where a highly gifted young musician, recommended by Joachim, had just arrived, and desired to play some of his compositions to us. Arrived at the Deichmann's, I saw a slender young man, with long fair locks, and a veritable apostle St. John's countenance, out of whose eyes there gleamed energy and a mind beyond the ordinary. The pieces he played to us were the just completed Sonata in C (Op. 1), the previously written Sonata in F sharp minor, the Scherzo in E flat minor, and many songs, amongst them the now often heard 'O versenk.' We other young musicians were delighted, enraptured, at once with himself and with his compositions. Two months later Brahms came to Düsseldorf, and saw Robert and Clara Schumann. And here he met with similar enthusiasm, which found its culminating expression on the part of Schumann in the much discussed and fought-over article 'Neue Bahnen,' in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik. The experience was the same again at Weimar, with Liszt, who himself played his first sonata to the composer, and where he was received with open arms, especially by the younger musicians." The description here given is a most interesting one, and the more noteworthy when it is remembered how many years it took before Brahms's compositions met with anything like general appreciation in the composer's native country. Several letters, it may be added, written by Brahms to Schumann, and bearing witness to the depth of feeling possessed by the writer, were published for the first time on the 7th ult., the composer's birth anniversary, by Fräulein Lina Kamann, in the Vienna Neue Freie Presse.

The proposal of the Edinburgh Town Council some time since to allow music in the parks on Sunday has been vehemently attacked by one of the councillors, who declared that if carried out it would exert a "degrading" influence on the populace of the Modern Athens. It is satisfactory to learn that this view is not unanimously shared by his compatriots. The Edinburgh Evening Dispatch devoted an ably written leader to the councillor's utterance, in which some remarkable statements are made as to the Scottish Sunday. The writer quotes the words of a Paisley magistrate, who describes Paisley on Sunday as a "perfect Pandemonium," and after paying a handsome tribute to the enterprise of the London County Council in providing efficient musical performances in the parks on Sundays, unhesitatingly gives it as his opinion that the superior sobriety of the Londoner as compared with that of the residents in the chief Scottish towns is due to the greater opportunities which he and his family enjoy for spending their leisure in a humane and rational fashion. There was a time, he adds, when people were put in the pillory in Edinburgh for desecrating the Sabbath by selling milk. But Scotsmen have no great reason to congratulate themselves on the growth of tolerance when town councillors—who uphold the maintenance of civic banquets on Sunday—anathematize the public performance of music on that day as calculated to "degrade" their fellow citizens.

QUEEN VICTORIA.

February 26, 1886.*

A quarter of a century to mourn
Thy wedded love, true woman-hearted Queen!
And now, as loyal as thou long hast been
To grief, thou loyal art to joy's soft morn,
That dawns upon thy heart, and doth adorn
Thyself and those around thee; with its sheen
Illuming thousands where thou'rt welcome seen
In smiles, a wide-spread kindly sunshine born.
Ay, "Mors et Vita" is the fitting strain
To touch thy widowed heart and teach it peace;
Life after Death doth cause its sting to cease,
Restoring it to gladness once again:
Well pleased, thy love beholds renewed thy cheer;
In sympathy of soul he hovers near.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

It was very nice of Mr. Paderewski to go down to Southampton and give a recital in aid of the town's hospital fund. The Mayor could hardly do less than express the thanks of the community in a "felicitous speech," but he did more by presenting the great pianist with a silver cigar case, suitably inscribed. I wonder what the local members of the Anti-tobacco Society had to say on the form of the souvenir. And that reminds me. At the recent Brecon Eisteddfod a prize for choral singing was offered by the licensed victuallers of the town. Up came a temperance choral society from Newport and won it!

Satisfied with the result of their autumnal series of concerts last year, the Philharmonic Society are arranging a similar campaign for next "fall." Madame Marchesi and Mr. Popper, the violoncellist, are already engaged.

With reference to my first paper on Victorian Opera, I have received the following interesting communication from Mr. Walter Macfarren:—"The 'Devil's Opera' was produced at the English Opera House (Lyceum), on August 13, 1838, and ran fifty nights in its first and upwards of thirty nights in its second season. The libretto was by my father, George Macfarren. The cast included Miss Rainforth, Miss Poole, Miss Priscilla Horton (afterwards Mrs. German Reed), Mr. E. Seguin, Mr. Frazer, Mr. Burnett, and the pantomimist, Mr. Wieland. The unknown author of the 'Emblematical Tribute' and its lyrics was also my father, George Macfarren, and the music of this pièce d'occasion was by my brother, G. A. Macfarren."

A correspondent writes me: "After many requests, Mr. Joseph Slivinski has decided to open a class, following the lines adopted so successfully by Rubinstein and Leschetitzky, for advanced pianoforte students. All communications should be addressed to Mr. John Mackey, Steinway Hall, who will give intending pupils all necessary information." Mr. Slivinski will be an important accession to the ranks of our resident pianoforte professors, and he has the hearty good wishes of those who desire the fullest development of executive skill in this country.

A CURIOUS action has been inconclusively tried in the Wigan County Court. The story of it, as told by a local newspaper, appears to be this: Mr. Moody, organist of the Wigan Parish Church, was at one time acting in Wells Cathedral for Mr. Lavington, who through illness could not discharge the duties of his post. While there he borrowed from Mr. Lavington, through the precentor, Canon Buckle, a manuscript copy of a Litany. This he transcribed, and returned to Canon Buckle in due course. Precisely what the Canon did with it does not appear, but, after two years, one of the minor canons discovered the MS. in his own possession. Meanwhile Mr. Lavington died, and his son entered an action against Mr. Moody for the return of the manuscript, laying his damages at £50. As the Litany was a known work by Tallis, the document had no worth, but the complainant set value upon it as being, so he believed, in his father's handwriting. Before the trial came on, the MS. was discovered. On its production in court, and inspection by the plaintiff, that gentleman said that not a word of his father's handwriting was there, yet it was the document he sought. This reduced the value of the MS. to nil. In the result the Judge refused a decision and ordered each party to pay his own costs. So that Mr. Moody was practically fined for the inadvertence of another man in allowing a borrowed article to go astray. The case is not without its lessons for both borrowers and lenders.

IT is satisfactory to know that the Shinner Quartet will not cease and determine because of the retirement of the lady after whom it is called. The end of the combination was reasonably feared at one time, but now that Miss Wietrowitz has consented to take Miss Shinner's place there is no reason why the Quartet should not go on and flourish abundantly. Chamber music offers a good field for the fine flower of feminine executive skill, and one which it may occupy with advantage to the art. For my own part, I am old-fashioned enough not to care for women in orchestras, where the work they do is often inferior to that of men, the necessary strength, energy, and decision being wanting. But the more delicate and sensitive work of the quartet, &c., is another matter, and women should be encouraged to take it up.

A CURIOUS mistake has got into print, and is going the usual round, with reference to my dear old friend the late Lewis Thomas. It first appeared, I believe, in the Illustrated London News; someone in the office of that paper having jumped to the conclusion that the will of another Lewis Thomas was that of the late artist. I wish he had jumped true, since the personal property was sworn under £65,000. Mr. Lewis Thomas, the bass vocalist, was not a prima donna.

THE most capacious theatre in Prussia is that at Frankfort, which seats 1,900 people. Next in order are those of Cologne (1,720), Berlin (Kroll's) (1,660), Hanover (1,656), Düsseldorf (1,597), the Berlin Opera (1,544), and Königsberg (1,500). The smallest on the list from which I quote is the Breslau Concordia (1,000).

I LEARN from the Gazetta Musicale that two English operas have recently been played in San Francisco, and that one of them was Benedict's "Lily Killaney" (sic), which is described as "a graceful work, evidently influenced by Weber and Rossini."

So the great organ in the Music Hall at Boston (U.S.) has been sold. It was built some forty years ago by Walcker, of Ludwigsburg (Germany), at a cost of 60,000 dollars; it contains 89 stops and 5,474 pipes; stands 70 feet high and weighs 70 tons. What does the reader suppose the 70 tons of musical machinery fetched under the hammer? Just 1,500 dollars—21 dollars a ton, or about 74 cents per pound.

CHURCH MUSIC.

FROM the far-away regions of West Australia comes information of an interesting performance of Stainer's very popular church oratorio "The Crucifixion," at St. John's, Freemantle, with Mr. C. W. Randle as conductor. In the same place Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was awaiting performance with orchestra and organ, and with a large choir. The energetic study of sacred choral music of the highest class in our colonies is one of the most healthy signs of the substantial musical progress now being made wherever the English language is spoken.

On the Day of Pentecost, or, as we say in our old-fashioned Saxon manner, Whit-Sunday, Palestrina's great "Missa Papæ Marcelli" was sung at St. Gervais', Paris, with the same composer's five-part motet "Loquebantur variis linguis apostoli," Vittoria's six-part motet "Dum complerentur dies Pentecostes," and the "Factus est repente de cœlo" by G. Aichinger, a priest and organist at Augsburg, living during the latter half of the sixteenth and the first portion of the seventeenth century. At the early vespers, specimens of the "Faux-bourdon" of the masters of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were sung. It was from a knowledge of this early school of church music, of which we have no parallel specimens in our Anglican writings, that Gounod gathered inspiration for his particular method of doubling parts so effectively, especially when writing in more than four vocal parts. Such music can still be heard with grand effect in many French cathedrals, notably at Amiens, and in other important Continental churches. Its study deserves the earnest attention of our church musicians. To complete the splendid list of works given at St. Gervais at the "Fête de la Pentecôte," several motets of the Palestrina period, as well as of recent date, were sung at the "Benediction" Service.

Such a day's record is one of many notable signs of the growing interest in the finest school of ecclesiastical music. We in London, duly grateful for what has been already done in this direction in various important churches both Roman and Anglican, have a distinct call for a kind of Palestrina Society, built somewhat upon the lines of the once famous Leslie's Choir, and devoted to the painstaking study of the finest specimens of the purest school of unaccompanied church music the world has known; and, further, to the practice of music selected from the church schools of all nations, following more or less the foundation patterns of the Italian school of the sixteenth century, which commanded the admiration of such advanced composers as Wagner and Liszt.

In addition to Dr. Martin's very striking and artistic Te Deum, the Coronation anthems of Handel, Dr. Bridge's Jubilee anthem, &c., appropriate music of a religious type has been multiplied in various directions, and "Festival" and jubilant services of past times have been requisitioned to celebrate the great historical event of the past month.

An excellent rendering by choir, organist, trumpets, trombones, and drums of Wingham's Te Deum, at the Oratory, Brompton, on Accession Sunday, completing a day of memorably unique ecclesiastical splendour, brought forward the question—Why is so little of the master's music heard?—a question made all the more forcible by the observation of a great Italian Catholic authority, expressing surprise that the modern English school had produced so fine a work as this stately song of the Church.

A correspondence in The Times, initiated by the Bishop of Chester, having reference to the position of organs in churches, will probably lead to some interest being taken in the labours and "Report" thereon of the joint commission of leading authorities of the Institute of British Architects and the Royal College of Organists, meeting in conclave eight years ago. The Bishop quotes extensively from the Report just named, and gracefully acknowledges the receipt of valuable opinions from such high authorities as Sir John Stainer and Sir Walter Parratt.

Two of the most interesting features of the opinions condensed into the Report are the proposed removal of the organ, or the chief organ, from the chancel and the placing of the singers in some well selected position in the nave. In large churches these proposals would be probably expanded into the restoration of the musical force to the people's portion of the building in each case, the nave, and the separate existence of a ritual choir in the chancel. These suggestions, really indicating a return to ancient methods, will very likely gain strength in the near future, when the whole question of church musical requirements arrives at a more general consideration; even though the value of space in small churches, where at least the "west end" position still remains a possibility, may compel further thought. In the case of new churches of fair or large size, the ample central space not provided or contemplated by the ecclesiastical architects at the junction of the chancel, transepts, and nave of the ancient cross churches may in some way be secured and there centralised.

Another letter printed by The Times includes a wise protest against the mania for organs too large and too powerful for the buildings in which they are placed, and which are objectionable for reasons both architectural and musical.

ORGAN MUSIC.

At St. Luke's Cathedral, Halifax, Nova Scotia, Mr. F. Gatward recently gave an organ recital which included an "Andante Moderato" by the late Dr. Garrett, whose organ music, if not great in quantity, is excellent in character. The popularity of another piece, Lemmens' "Storm Fantasia," seems quite undiminished. Why do composers of organ music revel, as the "stormy petrel" is supposed to do, in indications of atmospheric disturbances? There are surely other subjects for "the programme mood," in which the monarch of instrumental music may triumphantly proclaim a solo-playing supremacy. The same scheme included Mendelssohn's third Organ Sonata, originally intended to be the first of the set of six. The late Dr. E. T. Chipp performed these sonatas from memory and once played this No. 3 to the composer, which drew from him a gratifying testimonial.

The departure of prominent organists has been a sad feature of the news of the past few months. Recently we lost Dr. G. M. Garrett and Mr. W. T. Best; now we are called upon to mourn the deaths of Dr. J. Naylor, so long the organist of York Minster and a very able church musician, and Dr. W. Spark, for many years organist of Leeds Town Hall.

The programme of Mr. A. H. Allen's recitals, at St. David's Church, Denbigh, on the 14th ult., included Hesse's variations on "God save the Queen," which, with Rinck's version in the well-known "Organ School," represent the accepted settings in variation form; and after all it is perhaps best to leave the national tune in its unadorned simplicity. Rheinberger's fine Sonata in A minor was also played. Mr. Elgar's effective "Imperial March," with Mr. J. E. West's admirable "Victoria—our Queen" March, are found very useful by our loyal organists, and are duly appreciated by listeners. The former piece had a place in Mr. Allen's scheme.

Dr. Creser's programme for one of the St. Saviour's Cathedral recitals, on the 16th ult., included Rheinberger's Sonata in D flat, a work well worthy of players familiar with the powers of the "king of instruments"; a very attractive "Cantilène" by H. A. Wheeldon, and Handel's fine Concerto in D minor and major. In the course of these same recitals, on the 23rd ult., Mr. A. H. Brewer, of Gloucester Cathedral, gave another excellent selection, including "Rhapsodie sur des Cantique Bretons," by Saint-Saëns; Merkel's Variations on a theme by Beethoven; and Bach's great display piece, the Toccata and Fugue in C major.

At an organ recital given by Mr. W. G. Green recently, at the Warwick Lane Chapel, Coventry, Rheinberger's popular Pastoral Sonata was one of the pieces played; another sign of the prevalent and deserved popularity of the representative German composer's organ works. A "Meditation" and Scherzo for organ by the Italian master, Capocci, were also performed. The programmes played by Mr. H. W. Weston at Holy Trinity Church, West Hill, Wandsworth, on the 13th and 17th ult., were excellent. They afforded further proof, if proof were needed, of the commanding influence of Rheinberger's genius in the presence on the scheme of the Toccata from Sonata, No. 14, and the Pastoral Sonata. A movement from one of Widor's Organ Symphonies and Saint-Saëns's "Rhapsodie" (No. 1) represented French organ music, and the organ classics, Bach and Mendelssohn, also claimed places of honour in the well-arranged programmes. Mr. Edwin Barnes lately gave a recital at Holy Trinity Church, Northwood, with an interesting programme including Gade's "Moderato," "Allegretto," and "Allegro."

In the columns of the Pall Mall Gazette Mr. Algernon Ashton, the esteemed pianist and composer, has expressed his disapproval of the performance of a movement by Grieg for the pianoforte on the organ at a certain suburban church. Though good taste in selection must remain a necessary qualification in connection with the arrangement of music for the organ or any other instrument, it is rather too late in the day to protest against organ arrangements finding acceptance. The old masters wrote much indifferently assigned to either harpsichord or organ; Bach himself led the way, by arranging some of Vivaldi's and other writers' music for stringed instruments; and, not to dwell further on this topic—of marked interest, one must allow—the organ, with its great and varied resources, has long been, and probably always will be regarded as par excellence the specially privileged medium for the performance of arranged music.

JUBILEE MUSIC.

The thoughts and feelings which have so recently thrilled the hearts of Britons all over the world have found their highest expression through the divine art of music. The celebration of Queen Victoria's sixty years' reign—this unique event in our nation's history—has called forth an unprecedented outburst of jubilant strains, and millions of Her Majesty's loyal subjects, young and old, have raised their voices in notes of joy and gladness. "God save the Queen," as poured forth from 50,000 little throats at Sheffield, on the occasion of the Queen's visit to that busy centre, may be taken as the initial note of the pæan which has sounded and resounded throughout this vast empire. In countless "quires and places where they sing," and in concert-rooms and out-door celebrations innumerable, music has been the handmaid of the national rejoicings.

THE JUBILEE SERVICE AT ST. PAUL'S.

Words utterly fail to give even the faintest idea of the dazzling and moving scene which met the eyes of those who were privileged to stand on the steps of St. Paul's Cathedral at the open-air service on the great Jubilee Day, the 22nd ult. This never-to-be forgotten sight was most magnificent, baffling description, and we must therefore be content with merely recording the music that was performed and the manner of its performance. Sir George Martin's Jubilee Te Deum is now so well known that any description of it is unnecessary. But as one critic at least has referred to the peculiarity of beginning a festival composition with a minor chord, we have the highest authority for stating that the thoughtful composer had a special object in view in thus commencing his jubilant work. He had in his mind's eye the cheering of the crowds, the clanging of the bells, and that which would go to make up the purely secular element of the occasion at the time of the Queen's arrival at the Cathedral. The chord of F sharp minor, with which the Te Deum opens, was therefore intended to be the dividing line, so to speak, between the secular rejoicing and the sacred song of thanksgiving, and thus to withdraw the attention from things material to things spiritual. The service was accompanied throughout by the military bands of the Royal Artillery and the Royal School of Military Music, Kneller Hall. These efficient wind bands admirably sustained the voices. The choir, stationed on the steps of the West front, was very large, and included many eminent musicians and not a few well-known London organists. We noticed Sir Walter Parratt, Sir Arthur Sullivan, Sir J. Frederick Bridge, the veteran Dr. E. J. Hopkins, Dr. Hubert Parry, Mr. Randegger, Dr. A. H. Mann, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. Henry Gadsby, Mr. John E. West, and Mr. Joseph Bennett, who, with many others, were singing "with heart, and soul, and voice." Sir John Stainer represented the University of Oxford. The Children of the Chapel Royal, in their gorgeous scarlet and gold state uniforms, made a pleasant relief to the sea of white surplices, and further colour was infused by the bright robes of the doctors of divinity, music, &c., not to mention the gorgeous copes worn by the high ecclesiastical dignitaries.

Immediately after the arrival of the Queen, Sir George Martin raised his baton and the Te Deum was commenced. Every singer did his best—and who could help doing so on such a memorable occasion?—to give the work a worthy rendering, and the result must have been most gratifying to the new Knight, who carries his well-merited distinction with his usual natural modesty. The "Dean, Canons, and Minor Canons" sang "O Lord, save the Queen," to which the choir responded "and mercifully hear us when we call upon Thee." The Lord's Prayer was intoned with remarkable precision, the soft sustained chordal accompaniment of the wind band being in admirable keeping. After a short and very beautiful prayer, there followed the first verse of the 100th Psalm, "All people that on earth do dwell," and its doxology, sung in unison to the familiar "Old Hundredth." Sir George Martin turned towards the Queen to conduct this, and the simple strains of the fine old tune produced a thrilling effect. After the Benediction one verse of "God save the Queen" was spontaneously sung, and then "three cheers" were lustily and heartily given for our revered Sovereign Lady, Queen Victoria.

Her Majesty then proceeded on her triumphant way, and as she did so there came over us the feeling that the spell of this memorable service would never be broken.

WINDSOR.

Her Majesty the Queen attended a private thanksgiving service at St. George's Chapel, on the morning of the sixtieth anniversary of her Accession. The music on that interesting occasion included the Bishop of Wakefield's new hymn, "O King of kings," to Sir Arthur Sullivan's music, the Prince Consort's Te Deum, and "Now thank we all our God," to its familiar tune. The service, which would recall many touching memories, was naturally of a deeply affecting nature. At the afternoon service, held in the nave, Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was sung, with Madame Albani and Mr. Edward Lloyd as soloists. The choir was augmented to 200 voices and the orchestral accompaniments were played by the Queen's private band, the whole being under the experienced direction of Sir Walter Parratt, Master of the Musick to the Queen.

LONDON.

The Sunday morning service at St. Paul's Cathedral on Accession Day was attended by the Prince and Princess of Wales and several other members of the Royal Family. The music was naturally of a specially festal character, and included Handel's "Zadok the Priest," Sir George Martin's Jubilee Te Deum and Antiphon, and his recent Communion Service in A, with orchestra, specially scored for the occasion.

At Westminster Abbey, where Sir J. Frederick Bridge claims to have five organs (or is it six, including the pedal?), Martin's Jubilee Te Deum and Antiphon, Bridge's anthem "Blessed be the Lord thy God," and Stainer's "Lord, Thou art God," thrilled the huge congregations gathered at the various services. The organ was supplemented by a complete band of brass instruments and drums, which, as the Lord Chancellor and Peers in their robes, including Lord Salisbury, marched up the nave, played Gounod's Marche Solennelle in E flat, and the march from Mendelssohn's "Athalie" as they retired.

Not the least extraordinary development of music during the last two years is the practice of giving concerts in various places on Sundays. This has been remarkably exemplified at the Queen's Hall, London, where the scene on Sunday, the 20th ult., bore strong evidence to the change which has taken place in regard to public musical performances on Sunday. In the afternoon a full band and chorus, under Mr. Randegger's conductorship, sang the "Hymn of Praise" (Madame Clara Samuell and Mr. Ben Davies in the chief solo parts), Randegger's 150th Psalm, &c. A specially interesting feature was the presence of four such eminent musicians as Sir J. Frederick Bridge, Mr. F. H. Cowen, Mr. Eaton Faning, and Sir George Martin, who respectively conducted their own works—viz., the Jubilee Anthem ("Blessed be the Lord thy God"), the Commemoration Ode, the Jubilee Te Deum and Antiphon, and "The Queen's Song."

The Jubilee Commemoration concert of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, on May 6, was noticed in our last issue, and that of the Philharmonic Society is referred to elsewhere.

THE CATHEDRALS.

The festive character of the thanksgiving music was very marked in those venerable fanes which are the proud glory of our beloved land. We are indebted to the organists of many of our Cathedrals and Collegiate Chapels for supplying us with the necessary information for the following resumé of Jubilee services on Sunday and Tuesday, the 20th and 22nd ult.

At Bristol, with which Cathedral Mr. George Riseley has been connected as chorister and organist for fifty years, the Mayor and Corporation attended the morning service in state, when Wesley's fine service in E and Handel's "Zadok the Priest" were sung. The volunteers attended in the afternoon, when their bands accompanied this congregational service. At Trinity, Cambridge, under Dr. Alan Gray, Stanford in B flat and Handel's "The King shall rejoice"; and at King's, under Dr. A. H. Mann, Mann in A flat, Stainer in B flat, Wesley's "Ascribe unto the Lord," and "Zadok the Priest" were the principal Jubilee selections in the College chapels. Canterbury can claim to have the doyen cathedral organist in the person of Dr. Longhurst, who has been connected with the Cathedral for very nearly seventy years! The Sunday services at the Kentish city included Hopkins in A (morning), Stainer in A (evening), and Handel's "Zadok the Priest." On Jubilee Day, Rogers in F and Kent's "Blessed be Thou" shared the honours with Gibbons's "Hosanna." From Canterbury to Carlisle is a far cry geographically, but the services at the border city were planned on somewhat similar lines. "Behold, O God" (Walmisley), and "Blessed be the Lord thy God" (Bridge) on Accession Day, with Garrett in D (throughout), "O Lord, grant the King a long life" (Child), and "We will rejoice" (Croft) on the following Tuesday, were sung under Dr. H. E. Ford's direction. Chester, so closely associated with Handel's encounter with the "sight-singing" man, and where Dr. Joseph Bridge is the chief musician and conductor of the approaching festival, Martin's Jubilee Te Deum and a new hymn composed by Dr. Bridge were sung, and the band of the Cheshire regiment augmented the organ accompaniment. Across the Irish Channel, at the Chapel Royal, Dublin, an anthem composed by Dr. Culwick, "Behold, O God, our Defender," was included in the service.

Professor Armes, at Durham, had "put up" Smart in F (throughout), Walmisley's "Behold, O God, our Defender," the Professor's 1887 Jubilee anthem "Rejoice in the Lord," and, on Jubilee day, Child's "O Lord, grant the King a long life," and Handel's majestic "Zadok the Priest." A children's service in the afternoon was a pleasant feature. At St. Mary's Cathedral, Edinburgh, under Mr. T. H. Collinson's direction, a special diocesan choir festival was held on the eve of Accession day, when nearly 700 voices sang Martin's Te Deum, accompanied by the band of the Royal Scots; and Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion." Stainer's "Lord, Thou art God," accompanied by brass quintet, drums, and organ, was the feature on Jubilee day. Ely celebrated the event by Handel's "The King shall rejoice" at the Sunday evening service; on the Tuesday, Stanford's Te Deum in B flat and "Zadok the Priest" were sung by a choir of 150 voices, conducted by the organist, Mr. T. Tertius Noble. Exeter began the four services of the day at 9 a.m. with a military service; later on Martin's Te Deum, Bridge's "Blessed be thou," and Handel's "The King shall rejoice" were sung. A choir of 130 voices and band of thirty led the great Jubilee service, when the Te Deum was Haydn in C and Handel's anthem was repeated, all being under the direction of Dr. D. J. Wood. Mr. A. Herbert Brewer, the young and energetic organist of Gloucester, had arranged for "Zadok the Priest," Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and his own Festival Service in C. A special feature at Gloucester was the singing of two hymns and the National Anthem by a choir of 120 voices, on the tower of the Cathedral, at 8 a.m., on the 22nd ult.

Hereford, through Mr. G. R. Sinclair, records Wesley's "The Lord hath been mindful" and Goss's "The Lord is my strength," in addition to Stanford in B flat and Stainer in the same key. Leeds Parish Church is musically a cathedral. Here, under Mr. Alfred Benton, were sung the Prince Consort's Te Deum, Martin's Antiphon, and Handel's "Zadok." In the Town Hall, on Sunday evening, Mr. Benton conducted Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," with band and chorus of 350 performers. Lichfield, where Mr. J. B. Lott is organist, performed Stanford in B flat, the Prince Consort's Te Deum, and two of Handel's Coronation anthems. An identical programme was provided by Mr. F. H. Burstall at Liverpool, with the addition of Dr. Varley Roberts' anthem "I will sing unto the Lord a new song." Dr. Keeton, at Peterborough, records Mendelssohn in A (morning), Martin in B flat (evening), Beethoven's "Hallelujah" and Stanford in B flat (on Jubilee day). At Norwich, under Dr. Bates, Martin's new Te Deum, with cornets and trombones, and Handel's "Zadok"; and on Tuesday there was a "Service of Praise," when a unique procession, including hospital nurses and the Nonconformist ministers of the city, marched through the Cathedral. The Prince Consort's Te Deum was sung, and the service was accompanied by full military bands. Dr. Harwood accompanied at the "Cathedral Church of Christ" (more familiarly known as Christ Church), Oxford, Stainer in E flat and Goss's fine anthem "Praise the Lord, O my soul." At Magdalen, where Dr. Varley Roberts is organist, Smart in F, Handel's "Zadok," Hopkins's "The King shall rejoice," on Sunday; and on Tuesday, Smart in G, Handel's "The King shall rejoice," and "I will sing unto the Lord" (Roberts) were selected.

At Rochester, where the veteran Mr. John Hopkins is "chief musician," his own Te Deum in E, Handel's "Zadok," two anthems by his distinguished brother, Dr. E. J. Hopkins, Attwood's "I was glad," with the services by Stainer in B flat, Elvey in A, and Garrett in E formed the programmes. Music, under Dr. M. J. Monk's direction, is doing well at Truro, where Stainer's "Let every soul be subject" and Foster's "My heart is inditing" were the anthems. From Winchester, the former scene of S. S. Wesley's labours, Dr. G. B. Arnold reports that "Zadok the Priest" was sung by a choir of 300 voices. York, where Mr. Thos. Robinson is acting organist, drew upon two of the older cathedral composers in selecting Boyce in A and Attwood's "I was glad," in addition to Handel's "The King shall rejoice" and "Zadok the Priest"; but on the 22nd, Martin's Jubilee Te Deum and Antiphon were sung.

Similar reports from Chichester, Lincoln, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Salisbury and Wells were unfortunately received too late to be incorporated into the above record.

AN IMPORTANT COPYRIGHT QUESTION.

THE following letter appeared in a recent issue of our contemporary, Musical News:

TO THE EDITOR OF "MUSICAL NEWS."

SIR,—Our attention has been directed to an article in your issue of the 5th inst., in which reference is made to our action in interfering with an arrangement, by Dr. Coward, of Sheffield, of the National Anthem, on the ground that it "was based upon" the well-known arrangement by the late Sir Michael Costa, which is our copyright. No one regrets more than we do the necessity of that interference; at the same time, our right to interfere was beyond all question. To say that Dr. Coward's arrangement was based on Costa's is, we venture to think, an imperfect statement of the case. With the exception of one or two trifling differences, Dr. Coward's arrangement was Costa's. We forward a copy of each herewith to enable you to test the accuracy of this assertion. We were indeed unfortunate in being obliged to take steps to in any way disturb the proceedings at Sheffield on the occasion of the Queen's recent visit to that city, especially as the singing of the children under Dr. Coward's able organisation and conductorship was one of the most successful items in a programme that was successful throughout. But, assuming that we are entitled to claim copyright in the arrangement in question, which we say is Costa's, no other course was open to us. The reprinting of 30,000 copies of a valuable copyright was a serious trespass on our rights, and to protect our property we were forced to interfere; but the trespass itself was an insignificant trifle when compared with the far-reaching results of the trespass. To print any copyright without acknowledging the permission of the proprietor, inflicts far greater damage upon his property than the mere printing of so many copies, for it amounts to an advertisement to the world at large that the owner has no copyright interest in his own property, and the public are tempted to suppose that what is claimed by no one is common property, and they help themselves accordingly.

As an illustration of this damaging feature in the case, we may mention that we first became aware of Dr. Coward s arrangement, not from any evidence obtained from Sheffield, but from the receipt of a printed copy of the Sheffield reprint, forwarded from X (another town in Yorkshire). That copy was accompanied by a request that we would tender for the reproduction of so many thousand copies of it. The people of X may have recognised Costa's arrangement in the Sheffield production, or they may have been willing to infringe what they imagined to be Dr. Coward's arrangement. However that may be, the result of their appeal to us was an invitation that we would tender for the printing of one of our own copyrights! Seeing Dr. Coward's name on the copy they should have been better advised, but the whole point of our remarks is that the omission of our name was the essentially damaging incident in the Sheffield mistake. Apparently by an accident the people of X invited us to tender for the printing. Had they not done so any other printer might have actually printed the copies unknown to us, and so on ad infinitum. An experience extending now over a good many years has taught us that a copyright once infringed is permanently damaged, chiefly because of the impossibility of tracing and cancelling the numerous copies that are circulated without the proprietor's name attached. Each one of these copies may be, and a considerable portion usually are, utilised as "copy" for the local printer, and the ultimate injury done cannot be ascertained or estimated.

It was mainly because of this permanent damage that we interfered, and we think that everyone will admit that, if the copyright is ours, our interference was both necessary and proper. That this copyright exists is unquestionable.

In your article you ask that someone learned in the law will inform you what is the minimum of new matter which enables an arranger to claim copyright in an old air. Without professing to be learned in the law, we think we may hazard an opinion. To our mind it is simply a question of evidence by comparison—viz., whether, taking one arrangement as a whole, and comparing it with another, the points of resemblance are so close as to impel the belief that the one is, intentionally or accidentally, a copy of the other. You mention four peculiarities of Costa's arrangement. Without limiting those peculiarities to four, we submit that it is not legitimate to take each peculiarity by itself and to inquire whether each one in itself constitutes a copyright. The whole of the characteristics of the one arrangement must be taken collectively and compared with the whole of the characteristics, taken collectively, of the other; and if, so judged, the one is a copy or a colourable imitation of the other, then the second, in point of date of publication, is undoubtedly an infringement of the first. It might happen that one arranger, without ever having seen or heard a previous arrangement, might repeat it note by note. Nevertheless, his arrangement would be an infringement of an earlier published arrangement, and in the eye of the law it would be a copy. You ask whether a ritornello of six notes can be copyrighted. That, in the abstract is, we think, not a question for consideration. The point is, whether the arranger who first introduced the ritornello (Costa in this case), who used it at two places in the composition, and who used certain notes for the purpose, has not by so doing added to his work a new feature of musical merit which entitles him to claim it as his own. The same form of question must be applied to each one of the characteristics of his composition, whether four or more. The answer in the affirmative to any one of these questions would be sufficient to establish a copyright arrangement. But the final decision does not depend upon the answer to each or any of them; it depends upon the combined answer to all of them.

Your question is, "What is the minimum of new matter which enables an arranger to claim copyright in an old air?" We have endeavoured to show that this question cannot be answered in the abstract. A comparison is essential; but we do not hesitate to affirm that no new matter is necessary. The re-arranging of old matter without doubt may constitute a copyright without the addition of anything new. But it must be a new arrangement. As an example, we might instance the words of an anthem. Clearly every verse of the Scriptures is non-copyright. But if Sir J. Stainer or Professor Bridge, for the purpose of obtaining suitable words for an anthem, looks through the Scriptures and selects one verse from one chapter and one verse from another chapter, and so on, and collects the selected verses from various books in the Old or New Testament, or from both, and collates them so as to emphasise a common sentiment, or to illustrate a kindred idea, it cannot be disputed that he holds a copyright in the words of his anthem. Could anyone deny that in such a collection and collation of verses there is "literary merit"? and if there is literary merit there is also copyright, notwithstanding the fact that there is no new matter. Given a non-copyright melody, the same rules apply equally to musical arrangements and to literary arrangements.

To return to Costa's arrangement of the National Anthem, he not only conceived and planned certain characteristics of his own, but he arranged them in a certain defined order. His arrangement does not depend upon any one of those characteristics, it consists of the whole of them. No one else may do as he did. Each one of his characteristics may or may not of itself be sufficient to entitle him to monopolise it, but united they must stand as Costa's, and no one else's. Alterations in Costa's arrangement do not affect the question, but new features must not be engrafted upon what is copyright without them. We doubt whether any other arrangement of the National Anthem exists which contains so many essentially distinguished features as Costa's. To assert then that Costa's arrangements are not capable of copyright is tantamount to asserting that there can be no copyright arrangement of the National Anthem. This, again, is tantamount to a statement that there can be no copyright in the arrangement of any non-copyright melody, which is absurd.—Q.E.D.

It is only fair to add that Dr. Coward has told us that he never saw Costa's arrangement, but that he merely wrote down what he has heard performed, and what he has himself conducted, on many occasions. His statement, of course, concludes that point. No doubt, without knowing it, he has both heard and conducted Costa's version. But no one is entitled to reproduce or publish a publication, every note of which he knows by heart, if it happens to belong to someone else. Like yourself, we do not in any way reflect upon Dr. Coward's action, in face of his assurance above referred to, and we hope that he will acquit us of any other motive than the natural wish to protect what to us is a very valuable property.

Your obedient Servants,

HANDEL FESTIVAL.

Once again has the machinery of the Handel Festival got into motion, and ground out its great results with unfailing regularity. We have been so accustomed to this during hard upon forty years that the possibility of a breakdown never occurs to our minds. It exists, of course. There comes a moment to every human enterprise when its promoters learn that nothing on earth is immune from collapse and disaster. That moment, however, has not yet come to the Handel Festival, and we must all hope that it is a very long way in the future. At present the Crystal Palace authorities have only to touch a button and the wheels go smoothly round. One thinks of the late Count Moltke and the telegraphic word which, in 1870, transformed the peaceful, laborious German people into a congerie of armies. I am told that the operation which triennially places 3,500 singers and players upon the Handel orchestra is not exempt from change—that, for example, it involves more and more Londoners, and, consequently, fewer and fewer provincials. I cannot say, of my own knowledge, that this is actually the case; but Londoners, being close at hand, are less costly than their brethren from the country, and perhaps more easy to obtain. The balance of temptation is decidedly in favour of such a modification of the original plan as that referred to. Turning to a cognate matter, of course I see with my own eyes that the orchestra of the festival is more and more largely made up of female performers. With all due respect to feminine executive talent, I have a rather poor opinion of woman as an orchestral player. She is not devoted enough to her task to keep from looking about her when attention should be absorbed by the music, and if she were she does not possess the power and promptitude in attack which, as a rule, the men display. Were I in Mr. Manns's place, therefore, I should say to the feminine element, "Thus far shalt thou come, and no farther," especially after experience of the recent festival, with its falling off in the volume and energy of the strings. The exceptions just pointed out allowed for as such, the Handel machinery worked as before, and placed upon the orchestra a body of performers which, if not the finest of the series, was capable of grand effects, and worthily sustained the character made traditional by forty years.

The general rehearsal (11th ult.) was attended by about 15,000 persons—no doubt a large audience, but certainly a smaller one than usual, and thus early appeared ominous signs that the festival would lose rather than gain by nearness to the Jubilee celebration. It was natural, and, at first thought, not unreasonable to suppose that the crowds gathered in the metropolis for the national event would be glad to fill up the time of waiting by such an effective diversion as attendance upon the festival. But some not very recondite reflections indicated a different result. The Jubilee was certain to prove an expensive affair for its visitors, most of whom would be prompted by prudence to save in one direction what must necessarily be spent in another. Moreover, observers know full well that the public cannot serve two impulses at the same time. They yield to the stronger and neglect the weaker. All things considered, the 15,000 visitors to the rehearsal should have occasioned surprise that they were so many rather than disappointment that their number fell short of the attendance on previous occasions when the Handel Festival practically had the field to itself.

The programme drew largely upon that of Selection Day, but did so less for purposes of preparation than for the entertainment of the public. Miss Ella Russell, Madame Nordica, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. Andrew Black, and Mr. Santley were safe in the familiar airs assigned them for the Wednesday performance; while, as there were only eight choral numbers, all well known, the rehearsal, as such, of the selection pieces need not have lasted long. Nor, indeed, did it occupy the usual space of time, Mr. Manns being desirous of taking his freshly-gathered host through the arduous choruses of "Israel in Egypt." Already that work had been given an extra rehearsal, but Mr. Manns was not justified in letting slip any opportunity of guarding against such a disaster as that of 1894, when a chorus had to be stopped and recommenced. The result of further trial proved satisfactory enough for reasonable assurance, but the rehearsal, as a whole, did not come up to expectation. The chorus appeared lacking somewhat in confidence, often singing timidly and being backward in attack, while the tone of the sopranos struck me as singularly weak in volume and poor in quality, save when familiar music was in hand. No fault could be found with the basses and tenors, who were quite up to the old mark, and the altos were much as usual. From "The Messiah" only the "Hallelujah" was tried, but, to be in harmony with the hour, we had the National Anthem, followed by "Zadok the Priest" and the prelude to the "Occasional Oratorio"—most pompous of festal overtures. The orchestra further tested its own quality in a Minuet and Bourrée, and in the Organ Concerto in B flat, (No. 2 of the second set), with Mr. Walter Hedgcock at the solo instrument.

"The Messiah" occupied its old place in the scheme, and, on the 14th, drew together an audience numbering 17,101. Again a smaller number than ordinary, but by that time everybody was prepared for a falling off. Madame Albani, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley undertook the solos in the familiar work, discharging their task after a fashion which it would be waste of time to describe. So with the chorus, because if a choir of English men and women cannot sing "The Messiah" well, they can do nothing else even decently. No Handel Festival is ever likely to come to that. The greater examples of choral writing in the work were received as enthusiastically as ever, and general satisfaction prevailed, save when the eye marked the shrinkage of attendance from the customary standard.

On the 16th (Selection Day) the fall in numbers was still more serious, but this may, perhaps, be explained by the fact that the general rehearsal had presented most of the selected works at cheaper rates. But even then, the soloists, of whom four were prime donne, could scarcely consider themselves complimented by the unusual array of empty places. The performance was a decided improvement upon that of Friday. Chorus and orchestra alike showed greater confidence, and a more marked esprit de corps seemed to prevail. Hence such fine choral numbers as "Immortal Lord of earth and sky" and "Zadok the priest" came out with satisfying results. So, too, did "Envy, eldest born of hell," although a greater effect should have been made in the tremendous passage, "Hide thee in the blackest night," where the "additional accompaniments" proved most uncommonly reticent. The soloists were those who took part in the general rehearsal, plus Madame Albani, who, I believe, does not attend on such occasions. The successes of these artists were most decided in "Sweet bird" (Madame Albani), "Let the bright Seraphim" (Madame Nordica), "Ombra mai fù" (Miss Clara Butt), "Sound an alarm" (Mr. Lloyd), "Waft her, angels" (Mr. McGuckin), "Honour and arms" (Mr. Black), and "O ruddier than the cherry" (Mr. Santley). Particulars are quite uncalled for owing to the familiarity of the chosen pieces and the absolute knowledge that each artist was equal to the task appointed. Mr. Manns set his face like a flint against encores, and found that process easy when the audience had discovered that he could be firm. Only stern resolution is needed to crush the encore nuisance everywhere.

"Israel in Egypt" attracted an audience 16,777 strong, and when those figures came to hand we, of course, knew the full answer of the public to the Handelian appeal. The result was almost worse than anticipation. Only once before—in 1865—had the numbers dropped so low, and now there is much leeway to make up in 1900. The largest attendance stands on record as 87,796—this was in 1886. The smallest is said to have been 59,434. That of the present year will go down to posterity as 67,378. It was all the fault of the Jubilee, and it is consoling to know that Jubilees are not triennial. Some observers, it may be—more especially those who depreciate all composers save the idol of the hour—will try to see in the statistics of the late Festival an indication that the public are wearying of Handel. Well, if they like to build upon a false foundation they must. Time will teach and correct them. I grant that the attendance has been declining since 1888. Here are the figures:

1894 — 76,406
1897 — 67,378

But a search farther back shows that a fall is followed by a rise, and that the average remains about the same, while, with regard to the present drop from the figures of 1894, the special conditions under which the Festival took place rob it of all significance.

The closing performance, as might have been expected, proved more successful than any other, although the formidable obstacles presented by "Israel in Egypt" stood in the way. As already pointed out, much depended upon this effort. A disaster in 1894 had to be atoned for, and the public once more reassured on the point that the greatest of choral oratorios is safe at Sydenham. These considerations, we may well believe, were not without influence upon the conductor and his forces, putting them in the mood for special exertions and more than common heedfulness along every inch of a course abounding in pitfalls. The result was victory. Only once as the oratorio proceeded did signs of indecision arouse apprehension, but they quickly passed and the most difficult choruses, or some of them, were the most remarkable for executive merit. One was bound to admire above all the magnificently steady singing of the tenors and basses, whose progress showed all the qualities of the very best choral singing. They were ever "on the spot" and the majesty of their entrance after a "rest" satisfied even those who could compare the chorus with the very best of the series. It is superfluous to dwell upon particulars—to tell how the "Hailstone" raged, and how "He sent a thick darkness," most suggestive of musical pictures, made us feel the terrors of the Egyptian gloom. Again delightful was the change to "But as for His people," and jubilant the effect of "The horse and his rider," which, at the close, crowned the success of the day. I would wish the festival of 1897 to be remembered by the rendering of "Israel in Egypt." In it all concerned "triumphed gloriously" and proved that, if not better, they were at least as good as their fathers in Handelian singing. The solos, entrusted to Miss Ella Russell, Madame Clara Samuell, Miss Butt, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Andrew Black, and Mr. Santley were in execution on a par with the choruses. The American soprano gave the long-drawn strains of Miriam in admirable style; Mr. Lloyd stormed through "The enemy said" with as much vigour as Pharaoh showed in his pursuit, and with more success, while the delivery of "The Lord is a man of war," by Messrs. Black and Santley, stands unsurpassed by any of which my memory retains knowledge. So was the festival worthily rounded off, and the audience sent away charged with pleasant recollections of an event which in character, as in dimensions, is approached nowhere else.

I must speak highly of all the arrangements. They worked with the utmost smoothness. Especially must I compliment Mr. Manns upon the result of his arduous and responsible labours. All the lustre of worthy achievement was reflected upon the conductor, whose energies are as unflagging as his musical resources and skill are adequate to all emergencies.

Joseph Bennett.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

With the exception of the revival of M. Bruneau's lyric drama "L'Attaque du Moulin," which was mounted on May 29, the performances at Covent Garden have been chiefly concerned with the appearances of well-known artists in familiar parts and the début of a few vocalists new to England. The principal singers in "L'Attaque," Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Brema, M. Noté, M. Scaramberg, and M. Bonnard, were very much in earnest, but, save by Miss Brema, who impersonated Marcelline with her usual dramatic intensity and power, the spirit of the work was not caught, and the interpretation in its entirety was deficient in the verve and finesse which this opera imperatively demands. M. Flon conducted.

The presentation of "La Traviata," on the 4th ult., was a curious substitute for Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," in which M. Jean de Reszke was to have appeared; but it enabled Madame Saville, who sustained the title rôle, to deepen the favourable impression she had previously made.

The performance of "Tannhäuser," on the 8th ult., merits notice for the excellence of Mdlle. Pacary's assumption of Venus, and for the completeness of Mr. David Bispham's personation of Wolfram. The parts of Tannhäuser and Elizabeth were respectively sustained by M. van Dyck and Madame Emma Eames, whose assumptions were noticed at the previous performance.

An excellent rendering in German was given on the 12th ult. of "Die Walküre." Miss Susan Strong gave a charming and most able reading of Sieglinde, Miss Brema's embodiment of Brünnhilde was superb, both vocally and histrionically, and M. van Dyck's personation of Siegmund was manly and convincing. Madame Schumann-Heink as Fricka, Mr. David Bispham as Wotan, and Mr. Lemprière Pringle as Hunding completed the cast. At this performance, in place of the magic lantern representation of clouds and flying horses in the last act, there were substituted life-size horses which ran down a sloping board behind a set piece, but although more realistic the result was not so suggestive as the former device.

M. Jean de Reszke appeared as Tristan on the 14th ult., and again presented an ideal reading of the part. Isolde was impersonated by Mdlle. Sedlmair, a new-comer, and who, although somewhat deficient in vocal power, proved a most sympathetic and accomplished artist. Miss Brema, as Brangäne, and Messrs. Bispham, Pringle, and Simon were also excellent in their respective characters. The two last-named operas were conducted by Herr Seidl, who again showed consummate skill in securing due balance of tone between the voices and the orchestra.

Concerning Herr Dippel and Herr Brucks, who made their first appearance here on the 17th ult. in the respective characters of Lohengrin and Telramund, it may be said that both made successful débuts, but further criticism may be deferred until they have been heard in other parts.

The pleasurably anticipated first appearance in England of M. Jean de Reszke in the German version of the title rôle of "Siegfried" took place on the 21st ult., and it may unhesitatingly be said that the performance of the work was the finest ever witnessed in London. M. Jean de Reszke has rarely shown more convincingly how great an artist he is than on this occasion, and his embodiment of the fearless hero must be placed amongst his best assumptions. Herr Lieban gave his gnomish and extraordinarily finished reading of Mime, Miss Susan Strong was a fascinating Brünnhilde, and the words of Erda were finely declaimed by Madame Schumann-Heink. M. Edouard de Reszke was an impressive exponent of Der Wanderer, Mr. David Bispham's personation of Alberich was as complete as usual, and Madame Saville sang the bird's warnings with notable neatness. The orchestral portion was magnificently rendered under the direction of Herr Seidl, who was called on to the stage after each act by an enthusiastic audience.

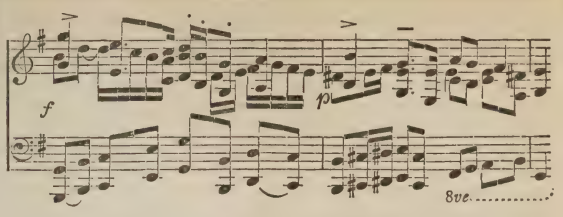
The State performance in connection with the Jubilee celebrations took place on the 23rd ult., when, owing to the number of foreign official personages in London, the house presented a more than usually brilliant spectacle. The programme consisted of the second act of "Tannhäuser," the third act of Gounod's "Roméo et Juliette," and the fourth act of Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots," which were severally conducted by Herr Seidl, Signor Mancinelli, and M. Flon. The heroines in these excerpts were embodied respectively by Madame Eames, Madame Melba, and Miss Macintyre, and their lovers by M. van Dyck, M. Jean de Reszke, and M. Alvarez. The last-named artist and Madame Melba made their first appearance this season on this occasion, and both sang very finely. M. Renaud, a new-comer, made a very favourable impression by his assumption of the parts of Wolfram in "Tannhäuser" and the Comte de Nevers in "Les Huguenots"; but State performances are not opportune occasions for calm and philosophical judgment of an artist's abilities. Other principal characters were personated by M. Plançon and M. Edouard de Reszke. The house was charmingly decorated with flowers, and the arrangements reflected great credit on Mr. Neil Forsyth.



PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

We doubt whether there is a busier man amongst British musicians than Dr. Hubert Parry since he became director of the Royal College of Music, and yet he has produced some of his finest music within recent years. When Walther in "Die Meistersinger" asks for a definition of a "Meisterlied," that lovable philosopher, Hans Sachs, replies (we quote Mr. Corder's translation):

> One who, spite care and duty,
> Yet sings a song of beauty,
> A master he must be.

In Dr. Parry's "Theme and Variations in E minor for orchestra," produced at the Philharmonic Society's concert of the 3rd ult., we have a "song of beauty," while it has never been more clearly demonstrated that the composer is indeed a master. Dr. Parry designed his theme, of course, with a special view to the treatment it was to undergo; yet it is a fine, manly tune, thoroughly characteristic of its composer in regard to phraseology, harmony, contrapuntal accompaniment, &c. Here it is:

Not content with following in the footsteps of the great masters of the variation form, Beethoven, Schubert, and Brahms, Dr. Parry must needs enrich the world with an innovation which is a stroke of genius and a veritable "Egg of Columbus." He has arranged his twenty-eight variations in four groups, corresponding in character, tempi, key relationship, &c., to the four movements of a sonata, though they are not divided by pauses. The divisions are clearly marked, more especially between the "first movement" and the Scherzo (to borrow the terms applicable to the sonata or symphony), where a solemnly impressive and richly scored "Pause" variation for the brass instruments forms a truly beautiful contrast to the following six variations in Allegro scherzando, vivace tempo. It would be presumptuous to offer a final opinion on a work so full of ingenuity and beauty after a single hearing. Suffice it to state our impression that there is not a dull moment in these variations and that they contain a rich store of alternately inspiriting, impressive, humorous, and always delightfully optimistic English music. And such is the spontaneous art of our English master (ars celare artem!) that a mere dry-as-dust display of learning is never even suggested. The splendid work will often be heard again, we feel convinced, for it is a masterpiece which will grow upon us and reveal fresh beauties each time of performance. It was well, though not perfectly played, and Dr. Parry was recalled three times. M. Sarasate played Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, songs were sung by Madame Sigrid Arnoldson by Gounod and D'Alabieff with consummate art, and the orchestra was heard in Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Spohr's "Power of Sound" symphony.

Three novelties, two by English composers, were produced at the Commemoration concert of the 17th ult. Of these Mr. Edward German's English Fantasia "In Commemoration" is the most important in scope. It is an attempt at a musical expression of the proud thoughts engendered by the glorious event celebrated during the last month, and is consequently laid out on a grandiose scale and scored for what Wagner would have styled "grosses Fest Orchester." The music is vigorously jubilant during the greater part of its course, while there are portions in quasi pastoral style, and yet others in which a prayerful or at any rate reflective mood seems suggested. The themes, without being striking, are well chosen, some of them being full of charm. The writing is very polyphonic and, in our opinion, too much so for a work of this class. This, we fancy, is the cause of Mr. German's want of success in making his orchestration effective. For he has not been able to so distribute the orchestral means at his command that each part stands out boldly, and the chief melody predominantly so. Moreover, he all but abuses the large number of percussion instruments, till their din overpowers almost everything else; wherefore we would strongly advise the gifted composer to partly re-score his work. The Fantasia possesses so many good qualities and has such evident chances of popularity that no effort should be too great to remedy its defects. Mr. Cowen's scena "The Dream of Endymion" (the excellent poem by Mr. Joseph Bennett) shows him at his best. It is thoroughly vocal and melodious, equally good in its passionate and languorous passages, and, like all his works, beautifully scored. The middle portion, commencing with the words "Ravishing music floats around," is in Mr. Cowen's most graceful and taking style; while the gradual working up to the impassioned climax, and the latter itself, show the composer's gifts of dramatic expression in a highly favourable light. Mr. Ben Davies sang it splendidly, and with the composer received the hearty congratulations of the audience. Mr. Leo Stern played a poor set of "Variations sur un Thème rococo" for violoncello (Op. 33) by Tschaïkowsky. Miss Adèle aus der Ohe performed Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto, and an absurdly long programme included Weber's "Jubilee" overture, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, and Sir Alexander Mackenzie's delightfully spirited, tuneful, and humorous "Britannia" overture, the orchestration of which is as sunshine and pure gold, and a true delight to every listener.

QUEEN'S HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The season of this society terminated on Ascension Day (May 27) with as satisfactory a performance of "Elijah" as has been heard in London for a considerable period. Mr. Randegger had his fine chorus thoroughly under control, and, as though each section desired to make a good impression before the recess, the result was a highly effective and conscientious rendering of all the work falling to its share. Particularly creditable, both for precision and spirit, was its execution of the dramatic appeals to Baal and the nobly wrought "Thanks be to God." Being in excellent voice, Mr. Santley had no difficulty in evoking enthusiasm for his characteristically vigorous delivery of "Is not His word like a fire?" and as regards the other portions of his task, the old energy, zeal, and masterly perception of effect were apparent. Miss Thudichum, Madame Belle Cole, and Mr. Lloyd Chandos also sang with taste and judgment, and a competent second quartet was obtained in Miss Clara Williams, Miss Lucie Johnstone (who sympathetically sang "Woe unto them"), Mr. R. Brophy, and Mr. F. B. Ranalow. The accompaniments were well played, and the general reception of the performance afforded assurance that the resumption of these oratorio concerts will be greatly acceptable.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Robert Newman concluded his first season of Symphony concerts at the Queen's Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. Henry J. Wood, on May 29, when the first performance in England was given of M. Saint-Saëns's setting for solo voice and orchestra of Victor Hugo's tragic ballad "La Fiancée du Timbalier." The solo was dramatically sung by Madame Marchesi, and the music, particularly the orchestral portion, proved of great artistic interest and worthy of its theme. M. Gregorowitsch, a young violinist of marked ability, made his début in England at this concert and created a very favourable impression by his playing in Mendelssohn's Concerto. The chief orchestral works were Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture (No. 3) and Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

The number of these concerts grows smaller every year, until this season it has dwindled down to three. But in these three concerts we were regaled with such superb orchestral playing that the desire for "more" was stronger than ever. At the first concert, on May 24, an important novelty in the shape of Richard Strauss's first tone-poem, "Don Juan" (Op. 20), was introduced without, however, achieving more than a succès d'estime. No doubt it bewildered the audience, in spite of a comparatively simple "programme," amply explained by the quotations from Lenau's poem, which precede the score. Yet the wonderful orchestration, full of the most brilliant colours and remarkable effects, the glowing passion pervading almost every bar, the ease with which the young composer mounts from climax to climax, and last, but by no means least, the beauty and strength of some of the themes should have appealed to a cultured audience; and we are of opinion that further acquaintance with such a complicated and wonderfully clever work will prove of advantage both to composer and public. The symphony was the "Pathétique" of Tschaïkowsky, in which the greatest sensation was caused by Dr. Richter laying down his baton at the commencement of the truly delightful movement in 5-4 time and letting his orchestra play without conductor. We have our own opinion of this "no conductor" joke, for we have ourselves on many occasions been under the spell of that genial eye of Dr. Richter's and know that he can effect more with a look than some conductors can with hands, and feet, and baton. Brahms's splendid variations on Haydn's chorale "St. Antonii," Beethoven's "Leonora" overture (No. 3), and Wagner's "Meistersinger" Vorspiel completed the programme.

At the subsequent concert, on May 31, Mr. F. H. Cowen's new symphony, "The Idyllic" (No. 6), was produced. According to the writer of the analytical programme the work suggests in its four movements—1. The pleasurable sensation of awaking in the country on a breezy, sunny summer's morning. 2. A walk in the fields which are resonantly bright with the sound of a shepherd's pastoral pipe (Allegro Scherzando). 3. The peace and meditative stillness of a hot Sunday afternoon (Adagio molto tranquillo); and 4. Evening out-door festivities. Such a programme would seem to suit Mr. Cowen's special gifts exactly; yet he has not succeeded in surpassing, or even equalling, his previous efforts in symphonic music. It is no doubt much more difficult in these days to write "idyllic" music that shall prove "effective" through the sheer abstract beauty of the subject-matter and its unsensational treatment, than to portray every possible and impossible mood and passion and affect for ever the "fine frenzy" suggestive of a disturbed peace of mind. Mr. Cowen's symphony contains a great deal worthy of admiration and closer study; it betrays in every bar the loving care of a thoughtful musician, whose utterances command respect if they do not cause immediate general admiration. A new young pianist, Mr. Gabrilowitsch, aged nineteen, a pupil of Rubinstein and Leschetitzky, created a sensation by his magnificent playing of Tschaïkowsky's Concerto in B flat minor, which, like most Slavonic music, contains some pretty themes and plenty of brilliancy, but is quite uninteresting and barren in those "working-out" portions in which the great German masters' mastery always shone resplendent. Dvorák's three overtures, "In der Natur," "Carneval," and "Otello," were played consecutively, in accordance with the composer's original intention. This only served to emphasise the weakness of the theme, which serves as a sort of leading motive in three works, a theme quite unworthy of such distinction. The overtures are brilliantly scored, and not devoid of some good points; but they contain no element of greatness. Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" concluded the concert.

The final concert, on the 13th ult., was devoted to a hackneyed, though thoroughly enjoyable Wagner selection and Beethoven's C minor Symphony. We can encompass our encomium of the performances in one word—splendid!

WESTMINSTER ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

The thirty-seventh public performance of this energetic organisation was held in the Westminster Town Hall on Wednesday, the 2nd ult., under the able direction of Mr. Stewart Macpherson. The programme commenced with the overture to "Der Freischütz," ably rendered by a force of sixty executants, including more than a dozen lady performers. Miss Kate Lee then sang with good German enunciation Brahms's songs "Gestillte Sehnsucht" and "Geistliches Wiegenlied," with admirable viola obbligato by Mr. W. H. Hann. Miss Rosalind Ellicott's Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra in A minor, rather in the Grieg manner, was first produced at the Gloucester Festival in 1895, in the one secular concert at the Shire Hall, on September 11. The solo executant on the present occasion was the young pianist, Miss Clara Asher, who played with much spirit and general accuracy. An absolute novelty in England consisted of a Romance and a Caprice for violin and orchestra by Signor Simonetti, who performed the principal part in his own pieces with much skill. They are melodious and brightly written, the warm applause they received showing that they were duly appreciated. Gade's piquant if not powerful Symphony in D minor with pianoforte obbligato (Op. 25) ended the performance. The pianoforte part was well rendered by Mr. Harold E. Macpherson. The Westminster Orchestral Society is evidently in a flourishing condition.

SIR ARTHUR SULLIVAN'S BALLET, "VICTORIA AND MERRIE ENGLAND."

If the music of "Victoria and Merrie England" can scarcely be said to add to the fame of Sir Arthur Sullivan, it is at least a very pleasing example of his genius. Moreover, that he should have been asked to write by the management of the Alhambra, and that his work should have successfully appealed to the habitués of the music hall, is a satisfactory proof of the great improvement which of late years has taken place in entertainments of this class. There is also an atmosphere of refinement and finished craftsmanship about the "Victoria" ballet which can scarcely fail to exercise a salutary influence. There is little to commend in Signor Coppi's scheme of the ballet, which practically consists of a series of detached scenes illustrative of certain well known national customs, concluding with tableaux vivants of the Coronation and Britannia. Signor Coppi's compilation is thus deficient in the essential element of the ballet proper, a connective story. The episodes chosen are the gathering of the mistletoe by the Druids, Elizabethan May Day festivities, the Legend of Herne the Hunter, the Procession of the Yule Log, and Christmas Revels. The May Day music comprises a number of dance measures, some of which are reminiscent of what has been heard at the Savoy Theatre, but this does not detract from their attractiveness, and several passages show the composer's rare talent of securing humorous effects from the orchestra. The best portion of the "Legend" is the graphic music written for the storm scene, although a subsequent waltz appeals more successfully to the majority of listeners. The Procession of the Yule Log is accompanied by the most distinctive music in the work. It is written on a ground bass of ear haunting character, and is humorously quaint and fascinating. In the "Christmas Revels" effective use is made of old English ditties, and a regularly developed fugue, in which each dancer begins at the respective entry of the subject, is a distinguishing feature. The entrance of English, Irish, and Scotch troops in the Finale is respectively accompanied by the tunes of the "British Grenadiers," "St. Patrick's Day," and "Scots wha ha'e," which subsequently are heard simultaneously at the union of the three forces. The composer conducted the first performance, and it was quickly apparent that all that artistic stage craft could do to ensure the success of the ballet had been done with generous zeal.

VARIOUS RECITALS.

The pianoforte recital given by the Misses Sutro, at St. James's Hall, on Monday, May 31, was a very enjoyable entertainment. The two young ladies thoroughly understand each other and played delightfully from first to last. Their programme commenced with a series of variations on a Sarabande of Bach, by Reinecke, after which came a Suite Concertante arranged by Saint-Saëns from Gounod, a series of cleverly written Variations in E flat minor by Christian Sinding, and various other pieces for two pianofortes by Ignaz Brüll, Algernon Ashton, Dvorák, and Chaminade. They were all played to perfection in matters of tone, style, and general intelligence.

The Armenian pianist, Mr. Sevadjian, gave his second recital at St. James's Hall, on Tuesday, the 1st ult. He played Grieg's one Sonata in A minor with all the delicacy it demands, and also smaller pieces by Chopin, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Godard, and Liszt; also another series of piquant Armenian airs adapted, as before, by himself.

That charming pianist Miss Ella Pancera gave her second recital on Thursday, the 3rd ult., and opened with Schumann's superb Fantasia in C (Op. 17), perhaps the finest work ever written for the instrument. The rest of the programme consisted of trifles, with the exception of Brahms's wonderfully clever Variations on a theme by Paganini. There was a large audience and Miss Pancera will be heard again with pleasure next season.

Another clever girl, Miss Adela Verne, the youngest and most gifted of three talented sisters, was responsible for an orchestral concert at the Queen's Hall on the following evening. This may be placed under the heading of recitals, as it consisted mainly of pianoforte music, including Chopin's Concerto in E minor, M. Saint-Saëns's in G minor, and Mozart's in E flat for two pianofortes, in which Miss Mathilde Wurm and Miss Adela Verne took part. All were well played and the orchestra was, of course, efficient under Mr. Henschel.

Miss Katie Goodson, a very youthful pianist, may be congratulated on the artistic success of her pianoforte recital in St. James's Hall on Friday, the 4th ult. She played a Sonata in A by Mozart, Beethoven's favourite but very difficult Sonata in C minor (Op. 111), Schumann's Op. 2, and various pieces of slighter dimensions in a way which entitled hearers to predict that in a few years she ought to attain a high place in her profession.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch, who created a profound impression on his first appearance as a pianist in London, has since given two recitals at St. James's Hall, one of which took place on Tuesday, the 8th ult. It is an unwritten law, more to be honoured in the breach than the observance, that a pianoforte recital must commence with a perversion of one of Bach's great organ fugues. After this error of judgment had been duly perpetuated, Mr. Gabrilowitsch gave a very fine performance of Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 81), "Les Adieux," &c., note-perfect and execution very clear. Two pieces by Chopin were not quite so well played, and in Schumann's "Faschingsschwank aus Wien" the young artist became apparently nervous and played many wrong notes, especially in the Finale. Two tastefully written trifles, "Mélodie Orientale" and Menuet, from his own pen, may be commended. The second recital took place on Thursday, the 17th ult.

Whenever Mr. Paderewski plays there is certainty of a full audience, and the recital programme offered on Tuesday afternoon, the 15th ult., at the Queen's Hall, exacted as much enthusiasm as on any previous occasion. The Polish pianist displayed his wonderful gifts as an executant to the best possible advantage in Beethoven's Sonata in D minor (Op. 31, No. 2), Schumann's Carnaval (Op. 9), Brahms's Variations on a theme by Handel (Op. 24), and several compositions by Chopin, Rubinstein, and Liszt. There was a measure of enthusiasm quite as great as on any occasion, and encores were as numerous, but of these no account need be registered. But it should be said that Mr. Paderewski was once more exciting and convincing. There is no pianist at present before the public who can touch the heart and the intellect with such irresistible effect.

THE KNEISEL STRING QUARTET.

The three concerts given by the Kneisel String Quartet at St. James's Hall, the last of which took place on the 9th ult., have fully sustained the reputation which this party has acquired. At the final performance was played an attractive and cleverly-written Quartet in E flat (Op. 55) by Mr. Georg Henschel. This was stated to have been originally composed in 1870, but revised last year. The four movements are based on melodious themes which are treated in a terse and interesting manner. The Andante, which consists of a tune of Folk-song character upon which are built some ingenious variations, is in particular pleasing music. The work was excellently played and cordially received.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The chief feature of the concert given by the students of the Royal Academy of Music, on the 10th ult., at the Queen's Hall, was the performance of Sir Alexander Mackenzie's setting for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra of Mr. Joseph Bennett's "Jubilee Ode." The solo portions were efficiently sung by Miss Gertrude Drinkwater, Miss Madge Drysdale, and Mr. R. Whitworth Mitton; but the principal interest of the work lies in the choruses, and there was much that was praiseworthy in the interpretation they received from the young choristers. Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E minor provided an effective medium for the display of Mr. Aldo Antonietti's admirable command over his instrument, and Miss Vera Margolies and Miss Gertrude Peppercorn both gave satisfactory evidence of having received good pianoforte tuition. Mr. Robert Radford's spirited and intelligent rendering of Vulcan's song from Gounod's "Philémon et Baucis" also merits commendation. Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

A STRAW shows which way the wind blows, and the performances of pianoforte concertos by Liszt and Tschaikowsky at recent College concerts should convince those whom it may concern that in one at least of our great music schools no hesitation is felt about teaching pupils important works, which, though they have not yet been generally accepted as classics, and are even occasionally condemned in toto by a section of the press, are yet supposed to be in the répertoire of every modern pianist. We can but commend the Catholic spirit thus lately shown, but we hesitate when it permits the teaching of Liszt's pianoforte arrangements of Bach's organ works. If our chief music schools experience no compunction about "tampering with the classics," to whom are we to look for respecting "the composer's intentions"? We were moved to make these remarks by the performance of Liszt's *de*rangement of Bach's Fantasia and Fugue in G minor by William Trehearne, at the pupils' concert of May 27. Beethoven's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in C minor (Op. 30, No. 2) was played with some feeling and spirit by Kitty Wooley, a very youthful student, and John Ireland. Ralph Courtier Dutton, who has a resonant baritone voice, delivered Hatton's fine song "Revenge" with considerable dramatic feeling and good pronunciation. Maud Wright sang Bemberg's Hindoo Song, and Brahms's difficult String Quartet in B flat (Op. 67), one of his "severest" works, proved somewhat beyond the reach of the four young people who essayed it.

The Brahms commemoration concert of the 8th ult. was one of the best ever given at the College. The programme consisted of five of the departed master's greatest compositions. In the purely orchestral pieces, the "Tragic" overture and First Symphony in C minor, the orchestra was at its very best, while Professor Stanford's readings, more especially of the symphony, did the fullest justice to the nobility and grandeur of the music. Nothing finer than the performance of the glorious Finale of the symphony has ever been heard at the College. The "Song of Destiny" and the inexpressibly beautiful Rhapsody for alto solo and male chorus, Op. 53 (surely the most truly inspired of all Brahms's works) were very impressively given, the solo in the latter piece being sung by Muriel Foster with much expression and finish, and excellent pronunciation of the German text. The gigantic Pianoforte Concerto in B flat (Op. 83) requires a consummate artist with exceptional power and breadth to make it thoroughly enjoyable. Its abnormal length was severely felt on this occasion (partly through the tempi having been slightly dragged), though Maud Branwell exerted herself heroically, and surmounted the terrible difficulties of the solo part with much success. Altogether, this was the worthiest Brahms In Memoriam concert that has been given in London.

At the chamber concert of the 16th ult. three new songs by William Hurlstone, a scholar, were sung with unaffected expression and sympathetic style and voice by the Hon. Norah Dawnay. They are melodious and refined settings of poems by Burns, Shelley, and Fritz B. Hart, and display culture and imagination of no mean order. Sinding's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in E (Op. 27) was capitally played by Mary Noverre and Gertrude Wortley. It is a strange work in which much that is original and attractive is to be found side by side with more which seems dull, erratic, and affected. Ethel Wilson displayed a well-trained, fluent technique in two pieces by Liszt, including the beautiful "Waldesrauschen," and Gwilym Evans proved himself a promising tenor singer in Mozart's delicious "Un aura amorosa" ("Cosi fan tutte"). Brahms's splendid String Quartet in A minor (Op. 51, No. 2) was fairly well played by Otie Chew, Ethel Rooke, Edward Behr, and R. Purcell Jones; while Herbert Fryer, C. B. Squire, William Read, Edward Behr, and S. Grimson were responsible for a very creditable performance of Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet.

MR. S. COLERIDGE TAYLOR'S CONCERT.

ADMIRERS of "national" music should have flocked to the Salle Erard on the 5th ult., when that remarkable young composer, Mr. S. Coleridge Taylor, who, as our readers know, is of partly African descent, gave a concert. The programme consisted of nine new songs, some for pieces for violin and pianoforte ("Hiawathan sketches") and five Fantasiestücke for string quartet, all of his own composition, interspersed with recitations by the gifted young negro poet, Mr. Paul Dunbar. We cannot find space to do more than generally express our astonishment at a composer barely out of his teens who produces work after work showing remarkable originality in almost every bar. Mr. Taylor, while still a student, reflects neither his teachers' nor anybody else's music, such a case being, perhaps, without precedent in the history of our art. That the element of beauty, as we understand it, seems as yet somewhat dormant in his music need not be insisted upon; for the young composer will doubtless develop in that as in other respects. Some of his latest songs do, in fact, already show a great improvement in this regard, his setting of a "Corn song" by Mr. Dunbar, to name but one, being full of a fresh beauty that haunts the memory. The violin pieces in slow time seem melodically far-fetched and affectedly vague, though very original; but his quick movements are full of tremendous vigour, strange rhythms, and a wild, untrammelled gaiety suggestive of neither European nor Oriental influence. An altogether new element seems here introduced into our art, the further development of which we shall watch with the keenest interest. May the fates be kind to Mr. Taylor and give him the fullest opportunities for developing his quite exceptional talent. Miss Helen Jaxon and Mr. Gregory Hast were the excellent singers at this deeply interesting concert, while Miss Marie Motto played the difficult violin pieces with capital effect.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

THE twenty-third session of the Musical Association was concluded on the 8th ult., when Mr. W. H. Cummings read a paper on "Music during the Queen's Reign." The lecturer began by describing the state of the art at the Queen's Accession, and read some contemporary press criticisms by Thomas Oliphant, the secretary of the Madrigal Society. The causes which had led to the present widespread appreciation of music were briefly reviewed, and a comprehensive sketch was given of the rise of the great music schools.

During the subsequent discussion Mr. T. L. Southgate, who occupied the chair, said that whereas in 1837 there were only living nineteen persons who had obtained degrees in music at the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin, there were now 520 members of the Union of Graduates in Music.

After the meeting the company dined together at the Holborn Restaurant in honour of the Diamond Jubilee, Mr. W. H. Cummings presiding in the absence of Sir John Stainer, President of the Association.

GRESHAM LECTURES.

THIS year being the 300th anniversary of the first Gresham lectures, the professors have devoted their several discourses to their respective predecessors. Professor Bridge, in fulfilment of his duties from the 8th to the 11th ult., gave a series of brief sketches of the life and works of the men who have held the chair of music since the time of Dr. John Bull, the first music professor, who was specially recommended by Queen Elizabeth. No other musician, however, occupied the position until Theodore Aylward, who was elected to the chair in 1771. An expressive trio for male voices, entitled "A cruel fate hangs," by this musician, and a "Catch," or, more correctly speaking, a "Round," in five parts, were effectively sung by Messrs. Oakley, Collard, Paul England, and the choristers of Westminster Abbey, which showed Alyward to have been an accomplished master of his art. The third lecture dealt with R. J. S. Stevens, a prominent representative of the school of glee writers, whose skill in this form of composition was abundantly shown by the excellent rendering of a number of his best glees by Messrs. Oakley, Collard, Webster, and Westminster Abbey choir boys. The fourth lecture was devoted to Edward Taylor, who was elected in 1837, and to Dr. Henry Wylde, who held the music chair from 1863 to 1890.

Edward Taylor seemed to have fully realised the importance of his position, and his energy and talent marked a new era in the influence and utility of these lectures. A high tribute of praise was paid to the life and work of Dr. Henry Wylde, who founded the London Academy of Music in 1861, and built St. George's Hall in Langham Place, which was opened in 1867, and is now known as the Matinée Theatre. The illustrations comprised songs by Taylor and Wylde, which were effectively sung by Miss Theresa Blamy and Mr. Avalon Collard.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.

Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland concluded, on the 12th ult., his series of four lectures on "Music in England during the reign of Queen Victoria." An interesting feature of the second discourse was an attempt to describe the various influences which composers exerted on their contemporaries and followers. The compositions of the really creative masters were shown to make for originality, life, and vigour, while the writings of less gifted writers who speedily got the ear of the public produced imitators whose endeavours resulted in the deadening repetitions of mannerisms. After referring to the works of Goss, Hatton, Loder, Henry Smart, G. A. Macfarren, H. Pierson, and Sterndale Bennett, the lecturer commented upon the visit of Wagner to England in 1855, and created some amusement by reading sundry press criticisms of that period.

At the opening of the third discourse, the lecturer said that although the word "renaissance" had been applied to the modern developments of music in England, it was only partially appropriate. Both, however, had in common the revival of an interest in and a love for the classics. The difference between the attitude of people in the present day towards music and that of thirty years ago, was mainly that in the former period music appealed to the few while now it interested all classes. Among the most important of the causes which had led to this change were the orchestral concerts at the Crystal Palace, under the conductorship of Mr. Manns, which were begun in 1855. They had not only fostered a love of the music of Schubert and Schumann, but had also given encouragement to British composers, some of whom were now acknowledged leaders in the art. Sir George Grove's admirable analytical programmes had also greatly contributed to the instructive character of these concerts. A far wider influence in spreading a love of music through the English nation, however, had been the Handel Festival, started in 1857, and, although these performances had not been an unmixed benefit, they had promoted a love for Handel's music among all classes, had stimulated musical enterprise in the provinces, and had played an important part in the musical education of the country. The foundation of the Bach Choir in 1875, under the conductorship of Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, had been an important feature in the education of amateurs and in the popularisation of Bach's music. We were also greatly indebted to the popular concerts begun in 1859, when St. James's Hall was a new building. The high-class character of the programmes was due to the suggestion of the well-known critic Mr. J. W. Davison. The enterprise of Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. W. Harrison was a powerful agent in popularising English opera, and prepared the way for Mr. Carl Rosa's company, which also did excellent work in raising the standard of operatic performances. Gounod first caught the ear of the English public by his opera "Faust," but the position he afterwards reached was due to his sacred music. The success of the latter was largely due to the ritualistic movement, to the spirit of which the mystic and voluptuous character of Gounod's masses peculiarly appealed. His long residence in England enabled him to gauge the English taste, and although this knowledge had no very invigorating effect upon his compositions it contributed to their popularity. The lecturer then reviewed the work of W. S. Rockstro and Sir Frederick Ouseley, and said that Sir John Stainer had handed down the finest tradition of English Church music while wholly avoiding the insular prejudices by which the influence of many successful composers had been weakened. Mention was also made of Frederic Clay, Alfred Cellier, and, lastly, Sir Arthur Sullivan. The brilliant series of comic operas by the last-named, the lecturer said, had indirectly affected the social status of musicians to no small extent. The British public had at last learnt the lesson that music could be grammatical without being dull, and that the composition of an Englishman might find as wide an acceptance as those of foreign origin.

Probably the final lecture was the most interesting to the majority of Mr. Fuller Maitland's audience, as it dealt chiefly with our living composers. A brief but comprehensive sketch was given of the productions of Goring Thomas, Frederic Cowen, Villiers Stanford, Mackenzie, and Hubert Parry, who were regarded as the revivers of musical art in England. Sir Arthur Sullivan could hardly be considered one of the masters of the English renaissance, as at that period, about 1882, when the force of the new movement began to make itself felt, his contributions to serious music consisted of a group of oratorios of purely old-fashioned character, and he had waited until 1886 before bringing out the "Golden Legend," upon which his lasting fame would depend. The lecturer then reviewed the younger men, mentioning Hamish MacCunn, Arthur Somervell, Edward German, Granville Bantock, William Wallace, and Frederick Cliffe. Referring to Brahms, the lecturer said that to all appearance the great line of German composers came to an end with this master. The wave of the young Italian music seemed to have passed over us without having had much effect. The wonderful masterpieces of the veteran Verdi, the "Manon" and "La Bohème" of Puccini and others, were not likely to be forgotten so soon as the hysterical productions of the young men of Italy who had the public ear a few seasons back. The speed at which musical culture, apart from technical education, had progressed in the last few years was very remarkable. Not only had orchestral concerts been given by famous foreign conductors, but in these last days a conductor of English birth, Mr. Henry Wood, had given performances in no way inferior to the best that came from abroad, and, more than this, he had already got the ear of the people. Great responsibility rested upon the cultured part of the public. They must realise the position which the best English composers held in comparison of other nations. The time had gone by when we need be asked to encourage native art because it was native; it was to be supported because it contained so much of the best quality. Judged by any recognised standard of merit, the best that had been accomplished by the masters of the English renaissance must deserve to be called great, and it was quite certain that these men could hold their own with any living foreign composer.

Numerous musical illustrations were given by Miss Louise Dale, Miss Gertrude Sichel, Miss Muriel Foster, Miss Nora Clench, and Messrs. R. A. Streatfeild, Charles Phillips, Owen Morgan, Clyde Twelvetrees, and the lecturer.

"MORS ET VITA" IN ITALY.

Gounod's sacred trilogy "Mors et Vita" was produced on Sunday, the 13th ult., at the stately Church of the Annunciation, in Genoa, for the first time in Italy, when the importance of the event attracted a very large congregation. An able analysis from the pen of Signor Lorenzo Parodi, the well-known critic of the Genoese journal Caffaro, had prepared music-lovers for the due appreciation of the noble work, which was performed by a choir of some 130 vocalists and an orchestra of seventy-five professors, under the experienced direction of the Cavaliere Del Signore. "Gounod," says the Genoese critic in the course of his highly appreciatory remarks, "who has never aspired to the laurels of the symphonist occupies a place in the foremost rank of composers of oratorio. In the 'Redemption,' he has musically illustrated the three great central facts upon which Christianity is based—viz., the Passion and the Death of the Saviour, and the diffusion of the Christian Faith throughout the world by means of the Apostolic Mission. In 'Mors et Vita,' on the other hand, Death, Judgment and a Higher Life are the exalted themes, expressed in music the most sublime and profoundly impressive. The seductive power of this music is such that none can escape its influence. It is a manifestation of prayerful devotion, of exaltation of soul, of perpetual adoration. The spirit is held now in violent tension by the chromatic unrest of the score, and again soothed by the sweet calm repose in the long-drawn chords and by the poetic grandeur of the orchestration." It remains to be added that Signora Mingotti, of Genova, and Signori Stara and Rolando, of the Cantoria of Vercelli, were the able interpreters of the solo parts.

MEETING OF THE ALLGEMEINE DEUTSCHE MUSIK-VEREIN.

THE performances in connection with the annual meeting of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Verein, held at Mannheim from May 27 to the 1st ult., were, as usual, representative of various styles and schools, and presented some features of special interest. Among these may be numbered in the opening concert a symphony for orchestra and pianoforte, "Sur un chant montagnard Français," by M. Vincent d'Indy, an essentially modern work, cleverly instrumented and distinctly original in the elaboration of its various themes. M. Risler played the pianoforte part, and both he and the composer, who conducted, met with a most sympathetic reception. The concert also included some remarkable new songs by Herr Richard Strauss, finely interpreted by Herr Kraus, of Vienna. The second concert (May 28) was devoted entirely to Brahms, and included the string quartets in B flat major and A minor, played by the Halir quartet party, as well as the "Vier ernste Gesänge," of which Herr Kraus was again the greatly applauded interpreter. The performances on the following day presented, amongst other compositions, a new symphonic poem, "Die Gefilde der Seligen" ("The Regions of the Blessed"), by Herr Weingartner, the Berlin conductor, which had not yet been produced anywhere. The work, which has been inspired by a painting of Professor Böcklin, is pervaded by a truly poetic feeling, clear in its form, and transparent in its polyphony, and, under the composer's own direction, achieved a distinct success. Notable features in the concert of May 30 were the "Variations Symphoniques" for pianoforte and orchestra, by the late César Franck, a composer who combined in his individuality Teutonic depth of sentiment with the French temperament; but it was necessary that he should die before his works could be appreciated; Berlioz's seldom heard monodrame, "Lelio," for orchestra, soli, and chorus, and three pianoforte pieces by Liszt, amongst them the pathetic "Vallée d'Obermann," in which M. Risler was again the highly appreciated interpreter. Miss Camilla Landi, who was the vocalist on this occasion, also came in for a good share of the applause. The two remaining concerts, on May 31 and the 1st ult. respectively, consisted entirely of chamber music. A new string quartet, by Herr Waldemar von Baussnern, was generally considered a musicianly, but somewhat colourless production, while a new sonata for violin and pianoforte, by Herr Robert Kahn, a closely knitted, fresh-coloured, and spirited work, interpreted by the composer and Concertmeister Schuster, was received with distinct favour. Dvorák's charming Quartet (Op. 105) was greeted with storms of applause, there being also in the programmes quartets by Haydn, Beethoven, and Schubert, and a number of songs by the late Alexander Ritter and Herr Weingartner. By way of prologue and epilogue to the meeting performances took place, at the Hof-Theater, of Mr. Eugene d'Albert's new opera "Gernot" (May 26) and of Herr Weingartner's music-drama "Genesius" (the 1st ult.). Mr. d'Albert's work suffers from a weak libretto and the performance was somewhat marred by changes in the cast and other mischances, which unavoidably occurred at the last moment. The score, however, is one of considerable interest and merit, the second act especially being highly effective. The composer conducted and Madame d'Albert was the very able interpreter of the principal female part. Herr Weingartner's "Genesius" is a work of a somewhat different order, less pronounced in its "modernity" perhaps than the other, pervaded by a lofty idealism, highly effective parts, particularly in the second and third acts, and moreover endowed with brilliant scenic effects. Dr. Wüllner, the gifted son of the eminent Cologne musician, who had undertaken the titular part at a short notice, and who made his second appearance on the lyrical stage on this occasion (he was an actor originally), surprised his critical audience by his masterly interpretation, and had indeed no small share in the considerable success attending the performance. Herr Weingartner conducted. In the course of business proceedings of the meeting, the publication of a complete edition of the works of Franz Liszt was decided to be issued in periodical parts for distribution amongst members of the Verein and others.

REVIEWS.

The Forty-Eight Preludes and Fugues of John Sebastian Bach. Analysed for the use of Students. By Frederick Iliffe. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE musical student of to-day should be grateful for his privileges. Even a generation ago text-books were rather dry and very dear. Now, by the expenditure of a few shillings, the earnest seeker after musical knowledge may obtain quite a library of useful and interesting books on the art, prepared by fully qualified experts—themselves earnest students—which are of the greatest possible value to the musician, be he young or old. The primer before us fully answers to this description. Schumann said of Bach that "Music owes almost as great a debt to him as a religion owes to its founder"; and an eminent musician of the present day has declared that "Bach's '48' is the musician's Bible." We may accept both these statements, and, in regard to the latter, introduce Dr. Iliffe as an excellent commentator. To quote from the interesting preface to the work: "The object of the present Analysis is to place in the hands of students a detailed and exhaustive scheme of every Prelude and Fugue." It cannot be denied that hitherto more attention has been paid to the Fugues than to the Preludes of the "48." "Why is Bach's name always connected with Fugues?" wrote Mendelssohn to his English publisher. Mendelssohn would heartily endorse Dr. Iliffe's opinion that "the Preludes are quite as wonderful, and more unique [than the Fugues], and the fineness of the work in many of them is of the highest possible order." This furnishes a tempting invitation for the student to proceed, under our author's guidance, to investigate the wealth of Bach's inventive genius exemplified in these remarkable Preludes. Dr. Iliffe sets forth the plan of his Analysis thus: "In the Preludes the mode of procedure has been—(1) To give the Figure upon which each Prelude is built; (2) to give the Prelude itself in full and copiously marked, or in a reduced form showing the structure; (3) a 'Summary' of the piece; and, lastly, general 'Remarks' upon the structure and treatment of the materials." As a specimen of this invaluable part of the work we may take the familiar first Prelude. Dr. Iliffe has reduced the delicate arpeggio embroidery of Bach's original to simple chordal progressions, with a figured bass, which he calls "Showing the Structure." (We are glad to see that he has omitted Schwenke's impudent interpolation of a bar between measures 22 and 23). In following this Analysis we have, at bar 1, "Period I., C major, establishing the key." Bars 5 to 10—the information being always couched in natural language—"From here it moves away to the key of the Dominant." Bar 12 is marked "Period II. Modulates to gain colour," and at bar 17, "Gently returns to Tonic." "Gently" is just the right word, and in both these sentences we have a taste of that poetic feeling which we feel sure has animated Dr. Iliffe in his work, and which is so eminently characteristic of the spirit of the music. Bar 20 records "Period III., Coda"; at bar 24 begins the "Dominant Pedal," and at 32, the "Tonic Pedal." When we add that the author has treated the whole of the "48" Preludes in this attractive manner, it will at once be seen that the student of this "Analysis" will verily have "a feast of fat things." The "Form" of the Preludes is also ably treated. Two of them (Nos. 36 and 42) "are," says Dr. Iliffe, "prophetic of the splendour of the modern Sonata Form; while two others—Nos. 29 and 45—are, with slight modifications, actually in this modern form as we know it to-day."

We have dwelt so much upon this unique Prelude section of the work that we can only refer to the Fugue section, which is a masterpiece of earnest studentship and unwearying labour. To quote again from the Preface: "With him [Bach] a Fugue was a perfect organism, and to the study of its unfolding and development he gave the best efforts of his life, recognising at the outset the fact that a Fugue could not survive the mere observance of formulas alone." Again, "He revels in a strong flow of polyphony, and frequently also of elaborate interlacings of the parts, heedless if a passing note occasionally rubs somewhat roughly against the regular material, or if one accidental momentarily looks askance at another. It is nothing more than the many-sided pebbles in the rivulet which momentarily roll—and make music—against each other, as the stream proceeds along its determined course." Such poetic language is in pleasant contrast to the pedantic diction of fossilised theorists. In analysing the Fugues, the author says: "a Tabulated Analysis—bar by bar—is first given, then a 'Summary' and 'Remarks,'" as in the case of the Preludes. The patient labour bestowed upon this part of the work must have been enormous, and should be greatly appreciated by every Bach student. The final words of Dr. Iliffe's Preface must conclude this inadequate notice of so valuable a contribution to musical literature. "The suggestions offered by a patient study of a work of this stamp are almost innumerable; the fount is, so to speak, inexhaustible, and the whole collection is securely placed upon the High Tower of Musical Art, the lasting joy and heritage of every earnest musician." We learn, from a very high authority, that Dr. Hubert Parry has not only been through every line and page of the book with approval, but has made many very valuable suggestions.

[Richard Bentley and Son.]

Lovers of music familiar with the tongue of the Fatherland have long esteemed this Autobiography, which was finished in October, 1799, two days before its author died. Karl von Dittersdorf was born at Vienna in 1739, and his father held the office of costumier to the court and the theatre. This position enabled him to give his children, who were five in number, a liberal education, and young Karl, who was the second of his three sons, having shown great aptitude for music, a teacher, one König, was engaged to give the boy, then seven years of age, lessons on the violin. Karl made such rapid progress that in two years and a half König declared that his pupil required another master, who was accordingly procured in Joseph Ziegler, a highly respected violinist of his day, and a composer of chamber music. At his advice Karl applied for admission to the orchestra of the Church of the Benedictines, and the precentor, Gsur, granting this request, the youth's playing one day attracted the attention of Hubaczek, the French horn player, who mentioned the boy's skill to his master, the Prince Friedrich von Hilburghausen, whose service young Karl was invited to enter. This appointment may be said to have been the foundation of Dittersdorf's successful career. The Prince apparently took a great fancy to the lad and had him instructed by the best masters, not only in music, but in languages, fencing, dancing, and riding. Of these advantages the young student seems to have fully availed himself. The varied amusements at the Prince's castle at Schlosshof did not, however, cause him to neglect his musical studies. "So far from hindering, they encouraged me to work, and even if I gave no proof of fiery genius, which never slumbers and sleeps and seldom does what it is told, I am just as well content; for my honest punctuality in time and business stood me in good stead in later life." His music master was Trani, to whose admirable tuition Dittersdorf undoubtedly owed much of his success. Every student of to-day may take to himself the following advice: "Study minutely the individual points of every artist, be he violinist, singer, or instrumental player, and when you have ascertained their various points of excellence, make them your own, not by slavish, but by free imitation; above all, let your own feelings be your guide; then you will be an artist." No little of the attractiveness of this volume is owing to the pictures presented of the amusements of the petty courts at this period. On one occasion, Prince Hilburghausen having to entertain his royal master, it fell to Dittersdorf's lot to assist in the preparation and carrying out of the masques thought necessary for the entertainment of the royal visitor. The fête was to include a ballet in honour of Bacchus. The appropriate music for this seems to have occasioned some discussion, in which Gluck joined. Finally, it was decided, at Dittersdorf's suggestion, that the most appropriate accompaniment would be four bag-pipes, two of which should be an octave lower than the others. To secure these, all the bag-pipe players in the Prince's domains were assembled, from whom four were selected by Dittersdorf, and taught by ear the melody they had to play. It is not said if Dittersdorf regretted having made his suggestion. Dittersdorf subsequently travelled to other courts, concerning the doings at which many amusing tales are told. He speaks of his successes over rival executants in a modest vein, but it is manifest that he possessed the assurance and self-reliance which go so far to make the virtuoso. He also seems to have composed with great facility in whatever form was demanded by the exigencies of the moment, and his music seems to have appealed with success to the taste of his day. Interesting references are made to a number of musicians and executants with whom in his professional capacities he had to deal, and many anecdotes brighten the pages of this vivacious autobiography.

English Minstrelsie. A monument of English song. Edited by S. Baring-Gould. Vol. VII.

[Edinburgh: T. C. and E. C. Jack.]

One more volume—the eighth—will complete this interesting "monument" of English songs. Not the least valuable portion of the work are the Prefaces and "Notes" contributed by the learned editor, the Rev. S. Baring-Gould, who is one of the greatest living authorities on the subject of English Folk-music. The instalment before us contains an "Introductory Essay on English Folk-music," in which Mr. Baring-Gould pleasantly relates some of his experiences of song hunting in rural districts. One of his contributors was an old stonebreaker, bearing the appropriate name of Robert Hard, of whom a portrait is given. Mr. Baring-Gould tells us that he "interviewed" Mr. Hard for a whole day, with the result that he "squeezed" out of him a dozen good airs with their words. A month or two afterwards the old stonebreaker was found dead on the road. But for that day's "squeezing," it is more than probable that these traditional melodies and words would have been irrecoverably lost. Mention is made of the selection of Folk-songs issued by Messrs. Novello in 1891, and edited by the late Dr. W. A. Barrett, a former editor of The Musical Times. "Most of his collection," we are told, "was made in Sussex, at Shoreham, from an old shepherd on the South Downs." The book, which contains an excellent portrait of Mr. Baring-Gould by way of frontispiece, is not only well edited, but is issued in an attractive style deserving of the highest praise. We notice two misprints. On p. 6, bar 1, the second note in the voice part should be E, not G; and on p. 24, "Clark Whitfield" should be "Clarke-Whitfeld."

Connla. A dramatic Cantata. Words by James Smieton. Music, for three solo voices, chorus, and orchestra, by John More Smieton. (Op. 25.)

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The libretto is founded to some extent on the legend of "Connla and the Fairy Maiden," as given in Joyce's "Old Celtic Romances" and Jacobs's "Celtic Fairy Tales." It tells of Connla, who feeds for weeks on a golden apple cast at him by a fairy maiden at first invisible. At length she appears to him and beckons him to follow her. They enter into a crystal boat, which "bears them over the waters towards the sunset." Space prevents us from noticing in detail this interesting work. The music, in which Scandinavian influence is perceptible, is fresh and imaginative. There is great variety of rhythm; and the epithet "dramatic" in the title seems quite appropriate. It is to be hoped that an opportunity will soon be given of hearing and judging the work.

Six Italian Songs. For a Mezzo-Soprano voice. Arranged, English words written and adapted, by J. Stainer. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

No little of the great musical progress made of late in England may be attributed to the revival and consequent study of the music of past generations, and the re-issue of excerpts from the old masters undoubtedly exerts a salutary influence on the musical taste of the day. The above selection of songs is well calculated to excite interest in music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The first example is a canzonetta by Cavalli, whose real name was Caletti-Bruni, and who was a singer at St. Mark's, Venice, in 1617. The canzonetta, entitled "Dolce Amor," is an excellent specimen of that tender and pathetic expression which placed its composer in the front rank of early opera writers. Alessandro Scarlatti furnishes the next song, entitled "Non dar più pene," which is taken from the opera "La Rosaura." There are two copies of the opera in the MSS. of the British Museum, but in one of these this song is completely spoiled by omissions and curtailments; and in the printed edition by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel the opening of the vocal part of the song has been marred by the introduction of an obvious false note which is not found in either MS. copy. The words are of a pathetic character, the music simple and expressive, and, in common with Scarlatti's writings of this nature, extremely well laid out for the voice. "Fier Destin," by Gasparini, is derived from an opera, "Antioco," a work which was very popular in London during the first half of the last century. The fourth song is "L'Immago tua Vezzosa," by Emanuele, Baron d'Astorga, who spent the greater part of his life as a diplomatist, but who was also a musician of no mean attainments. This is well attested by the example in question, which is one of the most attractive of the selection. The "Danza Fanciulla," by Durante, who was a pupil of Scarlatti in Naples, is a sprightly arietta with which a cultured vocalist could scarcely fail to enchant her listeners. The volume is concluded by a charming pastoral song from the opera of "Il Filosofo di Campagna," by Galuppi. This lyric was very popular in England in the middle of the last century, and was constantly sung by the then favourite vocalist, Miss Brent. All these songs are furnished with English translations of the Italian text, and musicians will appreciate the perfect appropriateness of Sir John Stainer's pianoforte accompaniments, which for the most part have only been indicated by the composers. It should be added that the selection includes some excellent historical notes, and that the songs "Non dar più pene" and "Fier Destin" are also published with a violin obbligato, which is justified by the original arrangement, and which, it is hardly necessary to say, increases their effectiveness in performance.

Six Original Compositions for the Organ. By J. W. Elliott. [Edwin Ashdown, Limited.]

MR. ELLIOTT has hitherto been known chiefly as a composer of highly meritorious church music and in connection with his admirable arrangements for the harmonium. Many of his friends have often wondered why he did not still further exercise his talent in writing for the organ, which he plays with consummate taste and skill. These six pieces are, therefore, very welcome. Such titles as "Patronal Festival March," "Intermezzo," "In the old abbey," and "Wedding Music" have in them an attractiveness which is fully endorsed by the excellence of the music, and we cordially commend this collection of pieces to the attention of organists. They are dedicated to Sir John Stainer.

Novello's Parish Choir Book. Nos. 298—310. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE quantity of sacred music is ever on the increase, and for this, of course, there is a good reason: there is an ever-increasing demand for it. No. 298 of the above-named series is a plain, yet effective setting of the favourite hymn "Abide with me," by W. T. Best, the great organist, who has so recently passed to his rest. No. 299 is the solemn Dies Iræ by the same composer, with Latin words, and English translation by the Rev. Dr. W. J. Irons, for voices unaccompanied. The music, with its quaint tonality and alternation of phrases in unison and full harmony, is impressive. No. 300, a Te Deum Laudamus, second series (Gregorian Tones), by Sir J. Stainer, with its voices in unison and voices in harmony, is chaste and dignified. The few chromatic harmonies in the organ accompaniments are of good effect. No. 301, Benedicite, omnia Opera, in chant form, by Sir J. Stainer and B. Blaxland, is broad and flowing. Some of the verses are set by the one, some by the other composer. No. 302, entitled "Faith, Duty, and Prayer," by Myles B. Foster, has music of simple character "for the use of Children in School, at Worship, or in the Home." No. 303, a Jubilate Deo in F, by Bruce Steane, is bright, melodious, and carefully written for the voices. No. 304 is a Cantate Domino and Deus Misereatur (in C) by Sir John Goss. The first is a simple, yet fine, vigorous composition; the second, opening quietly with the old ecclesiastical phrase so often used in their works by the great masters, offers excellent contrast. In both numbers the voices are throughout in unison. No. 305, a Harvest carol, "Make melody within your hearts," by the Rev. F. A. J. Hervey, is fresh and pleasing. No. 306 is a Harvest carol, "Sowing and Reaping," by J. Maude Crament, of a simple and tuneful character. No. 307, Benedictus, third series (Gregorian Tones), by Sir J. Stainer, has both charm and dignity. No. 308, Te Deum Laudamus in D, by Dr. Chipp, shows skill and character. The harmonies in the accompaniment of the passages in unison are bold, yet not extravagant. No. 309, a Benedictus, also in D, by the same composer, is of a quieter, though fairly similar style. No. 310, a Jubilate Deo in E flat, also from the same pen, is short, and the harmonies throughout are diatonic.

In Praise of Music. An anthology. Prepared by Charles Sayle. [Elliot Stock.]

THE compiler of this volume has founded his anthology on "The Praise of Musicke," attributed to Dr. John Case, and dedicated to Sir Walter Raleigh by the printer thereof, which appeared in 1586; and the method of the book is formed on that of the late Alexander Ireland's valuable "Book lover's Enchiridion." Mr. Sayle goes to the Bible for his earliest extracts, and these are followed by quotations from the writings of Confucius, Plato, Aristotle, and many other classical authors, through a long line of writers and poets of various periods and nationalities, down to William Watson of our own day. The compiler almost disarms criticism in the motto he has prefixed to the work: "Nihil est inventum et perfectum simul"; and an admission that some authors have been omitted by monetary considerations (presumably of copyright), and others "by an oversight," seems to show that he himself is not fully satisfied with the selection. In this connection it is surprising to find that less than four pages are devoted to Shakespeare, while more than seven are occupied with a sermon by Kingsley! Some of the extracts —e.g., those from Plato, Horace, Luther, Berlioz, and others—appear in their original languages, but as these are not all translated, the usefulness of the book is thus far limited as regards the general reader. In some cases it might have been difficult to get even a fairly adequate translation, but such a characteristic utterance of St. Augustine as that beginning "Quantum flevi in hymnis et canticis tuis" ought surely to have had an English version. These, however, are comparatively unimportant shortcomings of a book which is distinctly valuable, not only by reason of its intrinsic merits, but as a delightful companion to all who can appreciate the thoughts emanating from the minds of great men "in praise of music."

The Song of Jubilee. A Thanksgiving Cantata for solo voices, chorus, orchestra, and organ. By Jacob Bradford. [Novello, Ewer, and Co.]

THE composer of this work, which was performed at one of the Jubilee concerts in the Royal Albert Hall, on Saturday, the 19th ult., is unfortunately no more. He was born in London in 1842, and after being a chorister at St. Paul's, Walworth, he became organist in succession of several churches and devoted a considerable portion of his time to composition, among his works being an oratorio,

"Judith," several cantatas, and various miscellaneous pieces. An eminent London critic said of Dr. Bradford that he "could write fugues and double choruses with ease." The present work is one, according to the title-page, composed in celebration of the previous Jubilee in 1887, and a new edition is now issued for the present year. It is in seven numbers, one of which is mainly founded on the late Prince Consort's tune "Gotha," another on the National Anthem, while the Finale is based on the words of the well-known choral "All praise and thanks to God." Dr. Bradford's original music is certainly not pretentious, but it is broad and appropriately cheerful in character. "The Song of Jubilee" should be in request in the autumn, when the choral societies re-assemble.

National Portrait Gallery of British Musicians. With an Introduction by Joseph Bennett. Edited by John Warriner. [Sampson Low and Co.]

This volume contains over five hundred portraits of "musicians who are either natives of Great Britain and Ireland or who have permanently settled there, and on whom much of the present and future of musical art depends." With the portraits are given short biographical notices, detailing the leading events of each musician's career. In a prefatory note the editor regrets the omission of several portraits and notices that should have been included, but explains that copyright and other difficulties stood in the way. In the case of certain prominent musicians this is a pity; but otherwise the volume appears to us to err rather in the opposite direction. No doubt it would be far from easy to hit upon a plan of selection that would meet with everyone's approval; but in the present instance the choice seems to have been indiscriminate, and the result is that inclusion in the collection has, in a large number of instances, conferred far greater eminence than had been previously attained. This at least should, we think, have been avoided. The portraits are, in most cases, fairly well reproduced, and are arranged in groups of fifteen on each plate. The most valuable portion of the book is Mr. Joseph Bennett's Introduction, which should at an early date be published separately and in a cheap form. It contains a searching investigation of the racial and temperamental influences which hinder or promote musical development, and adduces facts of such importance that it should be read by every student in the land.

A Daughter of the Sea. Cantata for Female voices, with Pianoforte Accompaniment. Words written by Clifton Bingham. Music composed by Frederic H. Cowen. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The composer has always been particularly successful in works demanding fancy and grace, and this cantata, with its romantic tale of the gentle, golden-haired sea-maid who fell in love with a prince, whom she rescued from a watery grave, has given him an excellent opportunity of showing his taste and skill. The opening chorus is full of light, pleasing melody, interrupted, however, by agitated music descriptive of the storm at sea, which wrecked the vessel bearing the prince. The next chorus and the trio, sung by the sisters, are two dainty little movements. They are followed by a short soprano solo with trio. Soon comes an effective scena between the sea-maid and a sea-witch (contralto, of course), closing with a smooth "sleep" chorus. A choral interlude leads to a bright, tripping chorus, "From a distant land," and then, after another trio and solo, an attractive Finale, ending with soft and delicate strains, brings the work to a successful close. Mr. Cowen's "Daughter of the Sea" will prove a welcome addition to the répertoire of music for female voices.

Morning and Evening Service, together with the Office for the Holy Communion. Set to music in the key of E. By S. S. Wesley. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This fine work has been edited, with a Preface, by Dr. Garrett. He justly regards care and reverence in revising as the first duty of an editor; and further, "to make the composer's meaning clear wherever it is not fully expressed." Had no more been said we should hesitate considerably before agreeing with this second duty. Is the editor certain, it might be asked, that he has grasped the composer's meaning, and that his revision reveals it more fully? Wagner, for instance, suggested certain alterations in the score of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, and for the express purpose of making clearer the master's intentions. And yet there are musicians of standing who refuse to accept these suggestions. Each case, however, must be judged on its own merits, and Dr. Garrett calls attention to Wesley's "extraordinary carelessness in writing." Then again he had often heard the work in question under the composer's own direction, and he thus had special means of knowing how far the written text needed revision. Of the Service itself, "undoubtedly one of the finest compositions of its class," there is no need to speak in detail.

Balaam and Balak. A short Oratorio for Soli, Chorus and Orchestra. Words selected from the Holy Scriptures by Henry Knight. Music by Ferris Tozer. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The familiar story of Balaam, who, being asked to curse the "people come out of Egypt," blessed them, needs no description. This oratorio has a long, carefully written overture, the slow introduction of which commences with a phrase taken from a chorus for male voices to be found near the end of the work. The various choruses display solid and effective polyphonic writing, and the music shows not only skill, but also breadth and dignity. The oratorio was originally composed as an exercise for the degree of Mus. Doc.; of this we find traces in the bold chorale, "O Israel, from the morning watch," in eight parts. The fine opening chorus, also the excellent closing fugal number, were afterwards practically re-written so as to make them more suitable for general performance. The solos are not dry, but are the result—as one might naturally expect—of careful work rather than strong inspiration.

The Jackdaw of Rheims. Legend by Richard Barham. For Chorus and small Orchestra. By William H. Speer (Op. 8). [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

To illustrate by means of the art of tones a poem of this kind is no easy task. The music must not assert itself too prominently, and yet it must have sufficient character to justify its raison d'être. Mr. Speer has acquitted himself of his task in skilful manner. There are some effective realistic touches—as, for instance, the hopping, limping, and cawing of "little Jackdaw." But after all, these are small matters. The appropriateness of tone and word is felt all through, and by variety of rhythm and key interest is well sustained. Certain themes, or rather figures, connected with "Jackdaw" are employed in Weberian rather than Wagnerian style; and they, of course, help at times to give the clever accompaniment point and meaning.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The month of June usually brings with it the termination of the musical season. The only events of any interest just now are the out-of-door concerts in connection with our parks and the various concerts organised for the summer months by the managers of the Edgbaston Botanical Gardens.

The musical matinées in connection with the Royal Society of Artists' Spring Exhibition were brought to a brilliant close, on the 5th ult., with an excellent concert, at which the following took part: the Birmingham Temperance Philharmonic Choir (conductor, Mr. Graham), Miss Lizzie Chapman, Miss Elfie Hewitson, Mr. Frank Shale (vocalists); Miss M. Henderson Brownlie (violinist); Mr. A. E. Morris (pianist); and Mr. George Halliley (accompanist).

MUSIC IN CAMBRIDGE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The May term has not been remarkable for many concerts, but there have been some of an exceptionally interesting character. The annual chamber concert of the Cambridge University Musical Society was given on May 13. The Gompertz Quartet, Mr. Santley, and Miss Elsie Hall were the performers. The veteran baritone was in wonderful voice, and the warmth of his reception was unmistakable. Miss Elsie Hall, the young and promising Australian pianist, gave solos by Beethoven and Chopin in excellent style.

For its choral and orchestral concert, on the 14th ult., the Cambridge University Musical Society announced Brahms's Deutsches Requiem. This was probably the first In Memoriam performance in England of the deceased master's gigantic work, and an excellent rendering was secured, though the male chorus might have been stronger. Miss Fillünger and Mr. Arthur Walenn were the soloists. Schubert's Symphony in C, delightfully played, completed the programme. Dr. Gray conducted.

Dr. Mann's choir gave a "Festival Service," in King's Chapel, on the 16th ult. The choral works were the "Choral" Symphony, "Blest Pair of Sirens," and a Te Deum by the conductor. The symphony was well played, but the excessive resonance of the building caused the intricate passages to be somewhat confused. On the other hand, the tone of the wood-wind in the slower passages gained a singular charm, and the effect of the solo quartet, usually so unsatisfactory, was noticeably very much enhanced. Miss Fillünger sang the soprano part brilliantly, and the chorus did their work well.

Numerous college concerts have been given, but the authorities seem to have been hardly so enterprising as usual. The principal works performed were Schumann's "Luck of Edenhall," at Caius; Brahms's "Zigeuner Lieder," at King's; and Alan Gray's "Rock Buoy Bell," at Jesus. Cambridge music in general, and the Musical Club in particular, will sustain a severe loss next term by the appointment of Mr. H. P. Allen to the organistship of St. Asaph. His efforts to advance the cause of music in Cambridge during the last three or four years have been untiring, and the handsome presentation of musical scores made to him by his Cambridge friends showed that his exertions have been appreciated.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

The University of Dublin Choral Society gave its final concert for the season, at Trinity College, on the 3rd ult. The programme, arranged in commemoration of Her Majesty's Diamond Jubilee, included the following works: Handel's "Dettingen" Te Deum and "Zadok the Priest," Weber's "Jubilee" Overture, Stewart's "The King shall rejoice" and his five-part arrangement of the National Anthem. The principal vocalists were Miss Wann (alto), Mr. Melfort d'Alton (tenor), and Mr. Dudgeon (bass). Mr. Charles F. Marchant conducted.

The Leinster section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians gave its annual conversazione on the 5th ult., in the Ancient Concert Rooms. A large number of the members and their friends were present, and a programme of music was successfully performed, including the following compositions by members of the section: "Feis" prize duet for violin and pianoforte, by G. F. Bell; prize chorus glee, "Lodore," by Joseph Seymour; chorus, "Welcome," by J. C. Culwick; song, "In motley guise," by G. F. Horan; song, "Loved and lost," by Brendan Rogers; glee, "Descend, ye muses nine," by the late Sir R. Stewart. A harp solo, "Reverie," by J. Thomas, was beautifully played by Miss Josephine Sullivan, and Roeckel's dramatic song "Grace Darling" was rendered with much acceptance by Miss Shellard.

Mr. Ludwig, who was one of the principal vocalists at the recent "Feis Ceoil," gave two concerts of Irish music at the Rotunda on the 9th and 10th ult., in which he was assisted by Miss Rose Byrne, who sings in Irish; Miss Corcoran, Mr. Melfort d'Alton, Mr. L. Mooney, Mr. P. O'Shea, Mr. P. Delaney (violin), Mr. Owen Lloyd (harp), and Mr. Rowsome (Irish pipes). A large audience attended on both evenings.

A prize of £100 has been offered by a private donor for competition at the next "Feis Ceoil" for performances of Church music, written in the Palestrina style, by choirs of men and boys. It is possible that Belfast may be the centre for next year's "Feis."

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

The Norwich Diocesan Church Choral Association held its third triennial festival in the Cathedral on the 2nd ult.; 1,031 choristers, drawn from different parts of the diocese, were supported by a full band of about forty performers, led by Mr. F. W. B. Noverre. Dr. Bates, the Cathedral organist, conducted the service, which included the first part of Haydn's "Creation" and Woodward's anthem "The sun shall be no more thy light by day." So well had the voices been trained and finally rehearsed by Dr. Bates at their various centres that the performance was very successful. The solos in Haydn's melodious work were rendered with every mark of refinement by members of the Cathedral choir—Choristers White, Corbyn, and Burden, and Messrs. Hemmings and Brockbank. A very large congregation attended, the members of which showed their appreciation of all the labour spent upon the festival by contributing to the offertory a sum of less than £18!

Established ten years ago, the Norwich Ladies' Orchestral Society, numbering about twenty-five members, gave its ninth concert on May 26. Mr. F. W. B. Noverre has occupied the post of conductor since the inception of the society, and the playing of the fair amateurs does that gentleman infinite credit. The programme included Mendelssohn's C minor Symphony, the overture to "L'Etoile du Nord," two of Grieg's Norwegian melodies, &c., all of which were creditably played. Madame Sylvia Rita and Miss Margaret Birkbeck contributed vocal selections.

The closing concert of the season of the Hunstanton Choral Society took place on May 18, Van Bree's cantata "St. Cecilia's Day" being the work brought forward. Miss Beatrice Pallister sang the soprano solos. Mr. C. H. Lewis conducted, and, as he is leaving the neighbourhood after seven years' useful work in connection with the society, the president (Dr. Whitly), in the name of the members, presented him with a purse and illuminated address.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

An oasis in the desert of local events at the present period is to be found this year in the Chester Musical Festival fixed for the 21st, 22nd, and 23rd inst. The Cestrian capital is but a brief railway journey from the second city of the Empire, and musical Liverpool will throng to the older centre of art; and be it remembered that the Chester Festival is an event of by no means mushroom growth. Although it was temporarily suspended during the years prior to its revival by Dr. J. C. Bridge, it existed and kept the light of art burning long before such resident organisations as our Philharmonic Society essayed to foster it in the greater commercial centre.

The many friends of Mr. H. A. Branscombe, local and otherwise, will learn with pleasure that he has been appointed permanent chorus-master of the Bradford Festival Choral Society. He is also preparing the choristers of the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society for a performance of Berlioz's "Faust."

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

The main interest of Summer Term in the way of music is usually to be found in its College concerts, but this year, owing to various causes, many of these have been abandoned. Of those which survived, three—Exeter, Merton, and Queen's—which took place on the 1st, 3rd, and 4th ult., deserve notice. At the first-named the main interest of the concert centred in the orchestra, which gave a very creditable performance of Mozart's E flat Symphony and of orchestral pieces by more modern composers. Gade's "Crusaders" formed the principal attraction at Merton, and, considering the difficulty of the music, a good rendering was given. New works, specially written for the society, were again the chief features of the concert at Queen's, where "A Greyport Legend," by Mr. F. Cunningham Woods, and an "Ode to Music," by Mr. Myles B. Foster, came to a first performance. Both presented many characteristics of interest, and Mr. Foster's work in particular, which had the advantage of the composer as conductor, made a very deep impression and will certainly be soon heard again. A resuscitated and very charming song by Dr. Boyce, and Dr. Mee's "Horatius" were the only other notable things in the programme.

In other ways there has not been much activity. Mr. Farmer included a Brahms Memorial concert and a symphony concert in his scheme at Balliol and the solitary public classical concert was a very good one. Beyond this there is really nothing to say.

On the 16th ult. the Professor of Music gave a most masterly lecture on music as a branch of education, in the Sheldonian Theatre. Want of space forbids even the attempt to summarise this most important and significant pronouncement. It is to be hoped that it will shortly reach, by means of the printing press, a far larger number of people than the theatre could possibly hold.

MUSIC IN THE SOUTHERN COUNTIES.

The performance of Dvorák's dramatic cantata "The Spectre's Bride," in the Guildhall, Winchester, on Tuesday, May 25, gave special opportunities for the display of the exceptional abilities of the Test Valley Musical Society, which, under Mr. E. H. Moberly's able guidance, has reached its eighteenth season. The "Spectre's Bride" is an exacting work, and it is greatly to the credit of the society that it was able to grapple successfully with its many difficulties. No little of the success the work achieved on the occasion must be attributed to the intelligent and earnest endeavours of the choral force; while the playing of the orchestra, led by Mr. Alfred Burnett, was admirable. Mrs. Hutchinson acquitted herself admirably in the trying soprano part, and, as tenor and bass, Mr. Hirwen Jones and Mr. Douglas Powell were eminently successful. The concert opened with a splendid rendering of the overture to "Tannhäuser." Mr. Moberly, of course, conducted.

On Ascension Day the usual selection from "Elijah" was given in Salisbury Cathedral to a large congregation. The choruses, as might be expected, went well, and the solos were admirably sung by members of the Cathedral choir. Mr. C. F. South accompanied on the organ with his customary skill and judgment. A great choral festival, in which more than sixty choirs participated, took place on the 3rd ult., when the sacred building was crowded to its utmost capacity. The service was Smart in B flat, the anthem, Stainer's "Lord, Thou art God," composed for the Jubilee of 1887. The Hallelujah chorus from "The Messiah" was sung after the Benediction. The Rev. Precentor Carpenter intoned the service and conducted the chief part of the music. Mr. South presided at the organ, which was supplemented by a full orchestra and the band of the Royal Marine Light Infantry. Before the service Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" Symphony was played, under the direction of Mr. George Miller.

A pleasing concert was given, on the 1st ult., in St. Barnabas Hall, Southampton, by the Portswood Choral Society. The principal work was Mendelssohn's "Loreley," in which the solo part was sung by Mrs. E. C. Young. The miscellaneous portion of the programme included Cowen's commemoration ode "All hail the glorious reign," which was sung with much spirit. Mr. Christopher Young conducted.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

The first performance was given on the 1st ult., at the Opéra, of a new ballet-pantomime, entitled "l'Etoile," by MM. Aderer and De Rodaz, the music by M. André Wormser. The action takes place in Paris, at the period of 1797 to 1799, and in the first act presents a scene of popular rejoicings; a fair is in progress, accompanied by the clamorous musical strains which here may be looked for. The second act presents the stage of the Opéra, where a rehearsal is being held of the corps de ballet of 1799, and in which the juvenile members take part, so that, in fact, M. Wormser's ballet treats us here to a practice coram publico of the pupils of our National Academy. Without being particularly original or striking, M. Wormser's music is pleasing and danceable, some numbers, including a Bourrée, a Gavotte, and an Adagio for violin, being especially effective. Mdlle. Mauri, in the part of Zenaïde, scored a great success; Mdlles. Invernizzi, Torri, Robin, MM. Hansen, Ladam, De Soria, and others being likewise greatly applauded. On the same evening a revival took place of M. Massenet's opera "Thaïs," with Mdlle. Berthet, MM. Delmas, Alvarez, and Vaguet in leading parts; M. Brun playing the "Méditation" for violin solo most charmingly.

At the Opéra Comique M. Maurel renewed his success in Verdi's "Falstaff," which was given on May 27, while Mdlle. Delna kept the audience in excellent humour by her amusing representation of Dame Quickly; other parts being equally well filled, rendered the performance a really excellent one. On the preceding evening Madame Nuovina made her re-appearance in "La Navarraise." At the same house rehearsals are going forward of "Jacqueline," by M. Pfeiffer; "Daphnis et Chloé," by M. Busser; and "Phryné," by M. Saint-Saëns, which will be produced together.

A spectacular piece, "Le Chevalier aux Fleurs," by MM. Armand Sylvestre and Pugno, with music by M. Messager, has been brought out at the Théâtre Marigny. The piece is well adapted to a middle class audience, to which it appeals, and has been very favourably received.

As regards concerts, since there has been no cessation of their supply, notwithstanding the heat, we must refer to at least the more important of them. An excellent performance was given on May 18, at the Salle Erard, of the "Magnificat" and "Actus Tragicus" by Sebastian Bach, under M. Widor's direction. The interpretation of a number of compositions by Friedrich Wilhelm Rust, a last century composer, was the subject of two very interesting recitals given by Madame Roger-Miclos. These works were published some ten years ago at the instance of the composer's grandson, Wilhelm Rust, cantor of St. Thomas's Church, Leipzig, and fully warranted the homage rendered by the gifted pianist to a composer who certainly was in advance of his time. M. Paul Viardot, on the other hand, devoted a performance to the music of Scandinavian composers, including a string quintet by Svendsen, a pianoforte quintet by Sinding, a sonata for pianoforte and violin by Sjögren, and songs by Grieg and Kjerulf, brilliantly interpreted by Madame Oselio Björnson, a Norwegian singer, who was vociferously applauded. Another concert, given by M. Parent, was devoted to violin compositions of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Turning from these to French composers, I may mention that the Société Nationale recently gave its 262nd orchestral concert, the programme comprising works by MM. d'Indy, Chausson, de Bréville, Duparc, and others.

M. Oswald, a young Brazilian artist, has produced some of his own compositions here, and met with a very sympathetic reception, as did the Roman Quintet Party of MM. Luigi Galli (pianist), Fottorini, Zampetti, Marengo, and Bedetti. For the rest, I may pass over the hundred and fifty other concerts given by virtuosi, as usual towards the close of the season, the interest of which is confined to the executive skill displayed by the various concert-givers in the interpretation of well-worn works.

A commemorative tablet has been placed on No. 12, Place Vendôme, the house where Chopin died on October 17, 1849. Similar commemorative honours are, in accordance with a decision of the Municipal Council, to be paid to Ambroise Thomas, Benjamin Godard, and Pasdeloup.

M. Jaques-Dalcroze, who gave a concert on May 28 at the Steinway Hall, and another on the 10th ult. at St. James's Hall, is a Swiss composer of talent and self-assurance. The former was made manifest by his compositions, and the latter by the programmes of both concerts containing no other music but his own. The most notable works at the first-named concert were three well-written movements for string quartet and some graceful and fanciful pianoforte pieces, the latter being neatly and expressively played by M. Dalcroze. Mdlle. Faliero, the possessor of a soprano voice of excellent quality, did full justice to some examples of M. Dalcroze's skill in vocal writing, and able assistance was rendered by Messrs. Alberto Bachmann, Charles Jacobi, Alfred Hobday, Herbert Walenn, and W. L. Barrett. The final concert introduced to a London audience "Le Poème Alpestre," a lyrical work laid out for soli, chorus, and orchestra, which was originally produced on May 27, 1896, at the Geneva Exhibition. The text is of a patriotic character, which may have induced the prevalent employment of the brass, and the constant indulgence in fortissimo effects. Certain portions of the work, however, possess much merit, and show inventive powers and lively fancy. The soloists were Mdlle. Nina Faliero, and Messrs. Eugène de Dankwardt, Charles Loden, and Charles Clark, all of whom, together with choir and orchestra, worked loyally in the interest of the composer, who conducted.

THE students of Trinity College, London, who appeared at the concert at Queen's Hall on May 27, acquitted themselves very creditably. Although the performances were not of unaltering degree of merit, a satisfactory standard was reached, and in nearly every instance there was fair promise of better things. This cannot be said of all amateur displays. The Misses Janie Bridges and Kate Frewer sang with taste and discretion, each affording evidence of careful training. Mr. F. Theodore Flint played the Allegro con brio from Beethoven's third Pianoforte Concerto with facility, and others who exhibited knowledge of the resources of the instrument were Miss Maud Agnes Winter and Miss Suzanne Stokvis. Vieuxtemps' Fantasia Appassionata for violin was skilfully played by Miss Florence Brotherhood, the Adagio from Dvorák's Violoncello Concerto in B minor was ably executed by Miss Edith Evans, and Miss Edith Idle rendered with neatness Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor for organ. The students' orchestra, under the watchful conductorship of Mr. F. Corder, played the overture to "Euryanthe" and Bizet's little suite, "Jeux d'Enfants," in justly approved style.

THE meeting of the General Committee of the Birmingham Musical Festival took place on the 17th ult., at the Council House, the President, Lord Calthorpe, being in the chair. The outline programme was read, the chief features being the same as those indicated in our April issue. Councillor Beale, in an able speech, referred to the fact that there would be no fewer than four symphonies, and pointed out a particular feature in the Tuesday evening programme, which would include only one short choral piece; this was arranged with a view to give the chorus a much-needed rest after two days' fatiguing work. He took occasion to explain that a remark which he made at the February meeting as to the indifference of publishing houses to the issue of new works for Festival production had no reference to Messrs. Novello, who had been among the staunchest friends of the Birmingham Festival. Mr. Beale also referred to the question of lowering the pitch, and stated that the Birmingham Festival would adopt the normal diapason. He added that no doubt measures would be taken to lower the pitch of the Town Hall organ.

MR. WILLIAM NICHOLL, who has deservedly acquired a reputation for delicate rendering of old ballads as well as of modern songs, displayed his gifts in the former direction to great advantage, on the 8th ult., in the Queen's (Small) Hall. His programme was drawn from English, Irish, and Scottish sources, and the groups representing each contained several gems of simple melody ranging in character from the heroic to the purely sentimental. From Purcell was selected "I attempt from love's sickness to fly"; from Hook, "She lives in the valley below"; and from Arne, "Come, Rosalind," and "Celia's Charms." In the Irish section appeared Moore, Lover, and Crouch, whilst Scotland brought among other choice ditties "The Flowers of the Forest" and Mackenzie's "The Nameless Lassie." These and their companions, interpreted by Mr. Nicholl with his accustomed finish, afforded much gratification to a large audience. M. Emile Sauret played some violin pieces in his best manner.

A SPECIAL general meeting of the Incorporated Society of Musicians was held on the 18th ult., to celebrate the sixtieth year of Her Majesty's reign, and for the transaction of other business. Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who presided in the absence of H.R.H. the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, President of the Society, read the address which it was intended to present to the Queen, and which was cordially agreed to. A resolution was unanimously adopted that an orphan school for the necessitous children of musicians be established by the Incorporated Society of Musicians in commemoration of the sixtieth year of the Queen's reign, and that the Institution be called "The Incorporated Society of Musicians' Orphan School"; and it was further decided that Miss Helen Kenway's Orphan School should be taken over by the Society to form the nucleus of the proposed orphanage, subject to satisfactory arrangements being made with Miss Kenway. Several subscriptions were announced at the meeting, which terminated with the usual vote of thanks.

MDLLE. CHAMINADE'S annual concert took place on the 10th ult., at St. James's Hall, and proved as interesting as usual. Three new songs, severally entitled "Mon cœur chante," "Avril s'eveille," and "Fleur du Matin," all good examples of the concert-giver's talent, were effectively sung by Madame Ronchini, a young soprano possessing a pleasing voice, and Signor Ancona also successfully introduced a new lyric named "Espoir." Two other vocal novelties were "Veux-tu?" and "Sans amour," which had the advantage of interpretation by Madame Marchesi. Six new pianoforte solos, entitled respectively "Consolation," "Autrefois." "Terpsichore," "Prélude," "Sous Bois," and "Vert-Galant," were played with the utmost facility and a delightfully clean and crisp touch by Madame Chaminade, who was ably assisted in a couple of pieces for two pianofortes by Mdlle. Ten Have. Miss Clara Butt also gave much satisfaction in some French songs, and the opening movement of Grieg's Sonata for pianoforte and violin (Op. 45) was excellently rendered by Mdlle. Ten Have and M. Johannes Wolff.

THE London Academy of Music students had reason to be satisfied with the success gained at their orchestral concert at St. James's Hall, on May 28, with Mr. A. Pollitzer as conductor. There were fewer examples of the "vaulting ambition that o'erleaps itself" than is customarily manifested on such occasions, whilst the pieces were of a decidedly superior order. "Ah! se tu dormi," from Vaccaj's "Romeo e Giulietta," was sung in the correct spirit by Miss Lily Heale, to whose sympathetic voice it was excellently suited. Miss Edith Serpell with Mascheroni's "Ave Maria" also won favourable opinions in special degree. Miss Lucy King-Hall gave proof of strength and freedom in her rendering of the first movement of Saint-Saëns's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, and Miss Lena Fuller, a violinist, was properly complimented on her reading of a movement by Max Bruch.

MR. WILLIAM ARMSTRONG, music critic of the Chicago Tribune, gave a lecture on the 18th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall, on "A group of American song composers." The lecturer's remarks were very brief, and might with advantage have been amplified, seeing the interest and importance of his subject. Under these conditions the chief interest of the afternoon was centred in Madame Nordica's interpretations of songs by E. A. MacDowell, Ethelbert Nevin, Arthur Foote, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Isidore Luckstone, and Oscar Weil. The gifted prima donna presented the compositions of her countrymen in the most effective manner and was specially successful in "The robin sings in the apple tree" and "Confidence," by the first-named composer, and in "Land o' the Leal," by Arthur Foote, and "Ecstasy," by Mrs. Beach, these songs being the best of the selection.

MISS TRIXIE BARRETT made a good impression on the 17th ult., at her concert in the Beethoven Rooms, by the smooth rendering of several songs considerably differing in style. A sympathetic voice and good training were evinced in Somervell's "Shepherd's Cradle Song," in Cowen's "If love were what the rose is" and "There is dew for the flow'ret," and in morceaux by Bohm and Godard. With each of these she was thoroughly successful. Miss Florence Christie had pieces entirely suited to her refined style in Dr. Hubert Parry's "The Poet's Song," Cecile Hartog's "The Year's at the Spring," and Bemberg's "Aime moi." Mr. Albert Archdeacon effectively sang Miss M. V. White's "How do I love thee" and "Absent yet present," and a couple of Hungarian Folk-songs. Miss Hodder and Mr. Boddy did exceedingly well in Falchi's duet "An Eden Fair."

THE Church Sunday School Choir concert at the Crystal Palace, on the 19th ult., brought together representatives from about a hundred schools in London and the suburbs. The entire force under the baton of Mr. George Hare totalled 5,000, and a pleasing selection of sacred and secular pieces was gone through with much spirit and general efficiency. An important item of the second part was a Jubilee ode, "Victoria, we hail thee!" composed expressly for the festival by Mr. W. S. Desborough. It proved a telling piece, thoroughly adapted to the purpose, and, being sung with much animation, was well received. In Stephen Glover's "What a merry life we gipsies lead," and in other compositions, the youthful choralists sang with a firmness, readiness, and sustained power that was appreciatively recognised. Mr. F. W. Belchamber presided at the organ.

THE South Hampstead Orchestra, conducted by Mrs. Julian Marshall, successfully gave its twelfth annual concert on May 26, at St. James's Hall. The whole of the works had been adequately rehearsed, and the result was a highly commendable performance of Brahms's second Symphony in D, Tschaïkowsky's dainty suite "Casse-noisette," Beethoven's noble overture to "Egmont," and Weber's "Jubilee" overture, the latter of which has been heard several times of late in the metropolis, by reason of its containing the strain of "God save the Queen." Mrs. Marshall also carefully led her capable forces through the accompaniments to Max Bruch's "Scottish" Fantasia, the solo violin part of which was skilfully executed by Miss Lilian Wright, whose talent is far above the average. To the instrumental pieces the efficient singing of Mr. Henschel constituted an agreeable relief.

THE annual Gregorian festival held in London does not diminish in interest or attraction. On the 3rd ult. the whole of St. Paul's Cathedral was thronged, and the order of proceedings was much the same as on previous occasions. Over a thousand singers from about ninety provincial and metropolitan church choirs, together with a few instrumentalists, joined in the procession. The service music was, of course, chiefly Gregorian. The vigorous and stately chorus from Handel's "Saul," "How excellent Thy Name," was chosen for the anthem and received justice from the choralists. Afterwards came the impressive "Domine salvam fac," arranged by Gounod, the accompaniments having been harmonised by Barnby. There were several hymns, one, specially written for this festival by the Rev. Jesse Brett, being sung to the "Old 113th" tune.

MISS HOLLAND'S choir celebrated its "silver jubilee" with a concert in St. Martin's Town Hall on May 27. Mr. H. A. J. Campbell, the conductor, submitted a sacred piece, "They that go down in ships," which, if it did not startle the audience, on the whole undoubtedly pleased them. Another work new to this country was Josef Krug-Waldsee's cantata "The Fiddler of Gmünd," a poetic and imaginative production with many original and effective points. Mr. Hirwen Jones sang the tenor solo part with feeling and conscientiousness, and Mr. Percy Woodgate executed the violin obbligato of the fiddler. But the chief success of the concert fell to Professor Villiers Stanford's spirited cantata "Phaudrig Crohoore," which continues to gain friends. From beginning to end the chorus sang with tact and determination.

MESSRS. W. J. KIPPS and E. Newlandsmith gave an interesting pianoforte and violin recital at the new Concert Hall, Blackheath, on the 1st ult. The programme included Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata in C sharp minor (Op. 27, No. 2), Chopin's Scherzo in C sharp minor (Op. 39), and smaller pianoforte pieces by Mendelssohn, Henselt, and Liszt, all of which were rendered in an admirable manner by Mr. W. J. Kipps. Mr. Newlandsmith proved himself to be an excellent violinist in his performances of Vieuxtemps' "Fantasia Appassionata" (Op. 35), pieces by Wieniawski, and in a Ballade of his own composition. Vocal music was contributed by Mrs. Helen Trust with much acceptance, two of her songs—"Swedish Love Song" and "Robin in Winter"—being accompanied by the composer, Mr. Frank Idle.

MADAME BURMEISTER-PETERSEN gave an orchestral concert, on May 28, at St. James's Hall, and was the soloist in her husband's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor and in that in E flat by Liszt. Herr Burmeister's concerto was performed at a Crystal Palace concert in the Spring of 1891, but although its cleverness becomes more apparent on further acquaintance, its attractiveness does not correspondingly increase. The pianoforte part in this and in Liszt's brilliant work was effectively rendered by Madame Petersen, and the orchestral portions were ably rendered under the direction of Mr. Henschel. The programme was completed with Dvorák's overture to "Der Bauer ein Schelm," two neatly written movements from a suite by Arthur Foote, and one of Brahms's Hungarian dances.

IN connection with the Guildhall School of Music an orchestral concert was given at the City of London School, on the 2nd ult., Mr. W. H. Cummings conducting. The gentler sex was strongly represented in the orchestra and the whole of the performances were satisfactory. A novelty was an ably written scena, "Daybreak," by a pupil, Miss Clarisse Mallard, and it had a clever exponent in Miss Dina Harwood. "Eri tu," from "Un Ballo in Maschera," was neatly sung by Mr. A. Montague Borwell. Miss Madeline Payne won much notice by her intelligent execution of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, and full preparation was manifested by the orchestra in their steady playing of Beethoven's "Coriolan" Overture and Haydn's Symphony, No. 2, in D.

"THE Death of Moses," an oratorio by the Rev. Marcus Hast, was produced on the 9th ult., at the Queen's Hall, under the direction of Mr. Churchill Sibley, at a concert in aid of the extension building fund of the Jews' Free Hospital. The work is of old-fashioned mould, but has manifestly been written in an earnest and devotional spirit, and several numbers show an appreciation of melody and musical perception. The soloists were Madame Marie Duma, Madame Annie Marriott, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies, all of whom, together with the choir and orchestra, showed lively interest in the work. The oratorio was preceded by an effective anthem by the same composer in commemoration of the Diamond Jubilee of the Queen.

M. EMILE SAURET secured the support of an efficient orchestra, under the conductorship of Sir Alexander Mackenzie, for his concert on May 25, at St. James's Hall. M. Sauret's best effort was in M. Saint-Saëns's Violin Concerto in B minor (Op. 61), which was rendered in so effective a manner that the popular violinist was recalled four times to the platform. An "Elégie and Rondo" for the violin, from his own pen, further displayed his abilities as an executant and as a composer. Some songs were contributed by Mr. Arthur Oswald, and admirable performances were given by the orchestra of the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute" and two movements of Sir Alexander Mackenzie's picturesque suite "From the North."

MDLLE. IRMA SETHE gave an attractive orchestral concert, on May 25, at St. James's Hall. The accomplished Belgian artist was heard in Max Bruch's second Violin Concerto in D minor (Op. 44) and in that by M. Saint-Saëns in B minor (Op. 61), playing in both with masterlike brilliancy and only failing to give complete satisfaction in the tender and most imaginative passages. Some violin solos by Bach, Ernest, and Wieniawski were also rendered with consummate skill. Mdlle. Sethe was ably supported in the concertos by the orchestra, conducted by Herr Gustav Ernest, who also secured praiseworthy performances of Weber's overture to "Oberon" and Grieg's first "Peer Gynt" Suite. The vocalist was Miss Maude Danks.

PROFESSOR IVES, of Adelaide, Australia, is in London, engaged in visiting the principal musical institutions and enquiring into their methods of instruction and examination. With a desire to extend the usefulness of the chair of music so ably filled by Professor Ives at Adelaide, the late Sir Thomas Elder bequeathed it the handsome sum of £25,000, and the University Council are anxious to have advice as to the best ways of utilising this benefaction. Professor Ives has already had consultations with Sir John Stainer, Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Dr. Parry, Professor Bridge, and other eminent authorities, and proposes continuing his enquiries on the Continent.

Miss Florence Hughes gave a very successful vocal recital at the Steinway Hall, on the 8th ult. In the rendering of an excellent selection of eleven songs, Miss Hughes proved herself to be the possessor of a beautiful soprano voice and a true artistic style. We are glad to notice that she did not neglect to sing some English songs, which were not the least attractive features of a pleasant afternoon. Madame Fischer Sobell and Herr Willie Woltmann contributed solos on the pianoforte and violin respectively with much acceptance. A word of praise is due to Miss E. G. Hughes for her excellent translation of the German songs.

The result of the first of a series of brass band contests inaugurated at the Earl's Court Exhibition, on May 28, was as follows:—First prize, Wyke Temperance Band; second, Black Dike Mills Band; third, Batley Old Band; fourth, Rotherham Temperance Band. The adjudicator was Mr. W. Short. At the second of the contests, on the 11th ult., the prizes were awarded to Rushton Temperance Silver Band, first; Kettering Rifles Band, second; Earl's Barton Old Silver Prize Band, third; and Lincoln Malleable Iron and Steel Works Band, fourth. The adjudicators were Lieutenant Dan Godfrey and Mr. C. Thomas (late bandmaster of the Coldstream Guards).

The Signorine Cerasoli gave an interesting pianoforte recital on the 10th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall. The clever young artists opened their programme with Scharwenka's Scherzo (Op. 32) for two pianofortes, and subsequently Signorina Rosina Cerasoli gave an admirable interpretation of Beethoven's sonata, "Les adieux, l'absence et le retour," and Signorina Beatrice Cerasoli rendered Schumann's "Carnaval" (Op. 9) with notable intelligence and executive facility. Several smaller pieces were played in a brilliant manner, and pleasing variety was given to the afternoon by the singing of Miss Beatrice Tattersall.

Mdlle. Elsa Rüegger, a student of the Brussels Conservatoire, gave a violoncello recital on May 24, at the Salle Erard. This young lady's playing was marked by many excellent qualities, which, considering that she is only sixteen years of age, indicate her possession of exceptional abilities. The resonant nature of the Salle Erard makes it almost impossible to judge of the power of tone produced by string players in this room, but in this instance it was pleasant in quality, and the music was phrased in a manner that testified to good training. Some songs were expressively sung by M. de Kouschine.

The most important work at Mr. William Carter's Jubilee festival, on the 19th ult., at the Albert Hall, was Dr. Jacob Bradford's "Song of Jubilee," the soloist in which was Miss Esther Palliser. Other compositions suitable to the occasion were Mr. William Carter's "Thanksgiving Anthem" and "Jubilee Ode," and an unpretentious but effective "Celebration Ode" by Helen, Lady Forbes, the soloists in the last-named being Madame Albani and Madame Alice Gomez. Madame Belle Cole, Miss Mendelssohn, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Andrew Black also sang.

A series of choral and orchestral Saturday evening concerts, under the conductorship of Mr. Henry J. Wood, was begun on May 29 in the Empress Theatre of the Earl's Court Exhibition. On this occasion the principal works performed were Mr. Cowen's effective "Commemoration Ode," the overture to "Tannhäuser," and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." The soloists in the last-named being Miss Lucile Hill, Madame Olga Mihailoff, and Mr. Lloyd Chandos. The loud echo in this hall, however, militates against the success of these concerts.

Messrs. Puttick and Simpson, on the 17th ult., held a sale of valuable violins, the principal lots being from the collections formed by the late V. Purrier, Esq., A. E. Harper, Esq., and V. Scheiber, Esq. The highest prices paid were £610 for a violin by Antonius Stradiuarius, 1729, in fine condition, £48 for a violin by Nicholas Lupot, £41 for a violin by Pressenda, £50 for a violin by Ruggerius, £37 for a violoncello by Amati, and £36 for a violoncello by Rocca. The sale was composed of 120 lots, which realised over £2,000.

The East London Church fund annual service was held in St. Paul's Cathedral, on St. Barnabas' Eve (the 10th ult.), when over 350 representatives of Stepney choirs took part. From Dr. Varley Roberts's Service in C, composed for the festival in 1894 of the London Church Choir Association, came the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, and the anthem was Dr. A. H. Mann's effective "O Love the Lord, all ye His saints," sung with considerable spirit. Dr. C. W. Pearce conducted, and Mr. C. Macpherson was at the organ.

Two violin recitals were given by Señor Sarasate, respectively on the 12th and 19th ult., at St. James's Hall. The virtuoso interpreted familiar pieces on each occasion with his customary brilliancy and refinement, and was assisted at the pianoforte by Dr. Otto Neitzel. This gentleman is an accomplished musician, but his style of playing, although excellent by itself, is so little in sympathy with that of Señor Sarasate that at the first concert he twice received a request from a member of the audience to play more softly.

The grand symphonic concerts of the Kursaal, Ostend, alternately conducted by MM. Emile Périer and L. Rinskopf, were inaugurated on the 6th ult., and the summer season is now in full swing. M. Léandre Vilain gave a very successful organ recital on the 1st ult., at the Kursaal, the programme of which included an Introduction and Fugue by the late W. T. Best, as well as an Allegro in B flat and Tempo di Minuetto by Mr. Edward Cutler, which were greatly appreciated.

The Fitzner String Quartet from Vienna, consisting of Messrs. Rudolf Fitzner, Jaroslav Czerny, Otto Zert, and Friedrich Buxbaum, gave concerts on the 9th and 17th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall, and won considerable acceptance by reason of the precision and intelligence with which were rendered various well known quartets. The individual members of the party however have not acquired that oneness of style which goes so far towards perfection of ensemble.

Miss Maud MacCarthy gave abundant evidence of the satisfactory progress she is making in her art at her concert on the 11th ult., at St. James's Hall. Assisted by Miss Fanny Davies at the pianoforte, the young violinist gave an admirable interpretation of Brahms's Sonata in G (Op. 78), and subsequently was still more successful in Wieniawski's "Romance" from the Concerto (Op. 22). Distinction was given to the recital by Madame Albani being the vocalist.

A concert was given, at the Salle Erard, on May 29, by the students of the Primrose Hill School of Music. Many of these, in their various performances, testified to the excellence of their tuition under Miss Lavinia Conder, who herself contributed "O mio Fernando" to the programme. Valuable assistance was also given by Mr. John Fraser, and Miss Olive Kennett, this admirable reciter's efforts being much appreciated.

Performances of Dibdin's old ballad opera "The Waterman" were given on the 9th ult., at the Birkbeck Institution, and on the 10th, at the People's Palace, the parts being sung by Miss Alice Porter, Miss Susetta Fenn, Messrs. Frank Swinford, Sydney Taylor, and Sinclair Dunn, the last-named being encored on both occasions in the "Bay of Biscay."

The dates fixed for the Handel Festival at Mainz are the 18th and 19th inst., when the master's oratorio "Esther," in Dr. Chrysander's version, as well as "Acis and Galatea" and the "Ode to St. Cecilia," will be performed. In consequence of the illness of Dr. Kretzschmar, Herr Volbach will be the sole conductor.

The following concerts merit record: St. James's Hall.—Gabriel Fauré and Johannes Wolff, chamber concert, 5th ult. Johann Kruse, three violin recitals, respectively on the 1st, 11th, and 18th ult. John Thomas, harp concert, 16th ult. Queen's (Small) Hall.—The Regina Vocal Trio, 1st ult. Aptommas' harp recital, 3rd ult. Rosa Green, vocal recital, 4th ult. Lucy Stone, miscellaneous concert, 15th ult. Isidor Cohn, chamber concert, 2nd ult. Clarinda Webster and Julian Pascal, 4th ult. Oscar Noyes, vocal recital, 11th ult. Jeanne Douste, chamber concert, 18th ult. Sophie de Lubicy, pianoforte recital, 18th ult. Reginald Little, pianoforte recital, 21st ult. Salle Erard.—Grimaldi, pianoforte recital, 10th ult. Isabel Hirschfeld, pianoforte recital, 11th ult. Portman Rooms.—Clinton Fynes' orchestral concert, 1st ult. Dorothy Maggs' pianoforte recital, 4th ult.

Erratum.—June issue, p. 389. The title of Mr. A. H. D. Prendergast's interesting paper read before the Musical Association was "The Masque of the Seventeenth Century," not the "Eighteenth."

FOREIGN NOTES.

Ancona.—With much pomp and ceremony a marble tablet was unveiled, on May 29, at the Goldoni Theatre, commemorating the fact that Mascagni, before he became the "world-famed Maëstro," at one time conducted a small operetta company at this house. One wonders, with some degree of anxiety, whether the precious baton used on this memorable occasion has been preserved.

Barcelona.—A new opera, "Artus," by the young Spanish composer Amadeo Vives, was brought out with great success on May 27 at the Novedades Theatre. At the Liceo, where the season is an exceptionally brilliant one this year, M. Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila" was given recently, the composer being present.

Bayreuth.—On May 22, which is also Wagner's birthday, the twenty-fifth anniversary of the laying of the foundation stone of the Festspielhaus was celebrated. On the occasion in question, in 1872, the master directed a memorable performance, at the old Bayreuth Theatre, of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, in which many of the most noted instrumental and vocal artists of Germany and Austria-Hungary rendered gratuitous service. The architect of the Festspielhaus, Herr Otto Brückwald, is still living at Leipzig. For this year's Festspiele, commencing on the 19th ult., the house is sold out for every performance and the list has been closed.

Berlin.—The usual summer season commenced on the 2nd ult., at the new Royal Opera house (formerly Kroll's), with Rossini's ever-green "Il Barbiere." Amongst other works, an excellent performance of "Die Meistersinger" has taken place here since then. A new operatic company, under the direction of Herr Morwitz, has established itself at the West-End Theatre, and opened its performances on Whit-Monday with "Les Huguenots," Herr Thienemann being the conductor. The undertaking promises to be a distinctly successful one.——Tamagno made his appearance at the Royal Opera after all, where he sang, on May 24, in Meyerbeer's "Le Prophète," with the prices of seats trebled, and before a fairly numerous but not over enthusiastic audience. At Dresden and Leipzig, where the tenor likewise appeared during his present first German tour, he was, on the other hand, received with perfect storms of applause, while the majority of critics declined to treat this "tenore robusto" par excellence seriously from an artistic standpoint.——Dr. Wilhelm Kienzl, the composer of "Der Evangelimann," has set to music a little-known poem by Richard Wagner, entitled "Bonaparte's Rückkehr," written during the poet-composer's residence in Paris, where, in December, 1840, he witnessed the funeral obsequies of the first Emperor Napoleon, whose remains had been brought over from St. Helena. The composition has been published by the firm of Bote and Bock.——Professor Benno Stolzenberg has joined the staff of professors at the Sternsche Conservatorium for solo singing as director of the operatic section.

Bologna.—At a grand concert given here by the very active Wagner Society, on May 27, a portion of the second act of "Tristan und Isolde" was included in the programme, this being the first performance of the music in Italy. It was enthusiastically received by an audience including many musicians of note. The performance is to be repeated, under Signor Martucci's direction, at Venice.

Bonn.—Complete success attended the third festival of chamber music held here under the auspices of the Beethoven House Society, from May 23 to 27 inclusive. In the first concert, devoted to the memory of Brahms, the Joachim Quartet, Professor Barth (pianoforte), and Herr Carl Meyer (baritone) took part, and were the recipients of enthusiastic applause. Equally favourable was the reception accorded in subsequent performances, chiefly consisting of works by Beethoven, to the quartet party led by Professor Heermann, of Frankfort; the Hess Quartet, of Cologne; Herr Mühlfeld, the eminent clarinettist; Mr. Leonard Borwick, and others. The last-named English artist met with a particularly warm appreciation. The festival was throughout very well attended.

Bromberg.—Kienzl's "Der Evangelimann" was brought out here on the 3rd ult., with the accustomed success, this bringing the number of theatres where the work has so far been produced to one hundred.

Brussels.—An interesting musical celebration was announced to take place here on the 26th ult., to commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of the restoration of the Grand Place after the bombardment and conflagration of 1694. The proceedings included the performance, by some three hundred singers selected from the leading Flemish choral societies, of a choral work written for the occasion by M. J. de Mol; as well as a concert given at the Hôtel de Ville, when the programme consisted of orchestral works by Flemish composers ancient and modern, of Rondes and Chansons satiriques of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries sung by the vocal double quartet under the direction of M. Soubre, dressed in the costume of the period, and of a ballet divertissement the music for which is taken from "Castor et Pollux," of Rameau, and the "Mascarade de Versailles," of Lully.——An unaccompanied mass for five voices, by M. Edgar Tinel, was performed at the Church of Saint Boniface on Whit-Sunday, the service also including the performance by the choir of a new Ave Maria for four voices with organ by the same composer.

Budapest.—The season at the Royal Opera came to a close on May 25, with a capital performance of Kienzl's "Der Evangelimann," in which a young singer, Madame Betty de Ponty, especially distinguished herself in the part of Magdalena. The director of the opera, M. Nopcsa, a former captain of Hussars, retired from his post on the same occasion, greatly to the satisfaction of artistic circles here. It was owing to M. Nopcsa's cavalierly treatment of him that Herr Nikisch resigned the conductorship of the Royal Opera some two years since.

Cassel.—Eugene d'Albert's fairy opera, "Der Rubin," first brought out some two years since at Weimar, was produced at the Hof-Theater, on the 4th ult., under the composer's direction, and well received, the performance being, moreover, a very satisfactory one.

Düsseldorf.—The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra concluded its recent highly successful tour in France, Belgium, Switzerland, and the Rhine districts with a concert given here, on May 28, under the direction of Herr Nikisch. In accordance with its annual custom, this excellent orchestral body is now stationed at Scheveningen during the season.

Hamburg.—Herr Pollini, the well-known director of the Stadt-Theater, has undertaken to produce the already much talked of music-drama "Gœa," by Herr Adalbert von Goldschmidt, in its entirety, the performance occupying several evenings and making exceptional demands, both as regards personnel and the mounting generally. The representation of the important work, which is to take the form of a festival, will, it is hoped, take place in April next.

Helsingfors.—The appreciation on the part of the public here of Shakespeare, in association with Mendelssohn, has been strikingly illustrated in twelve consecutive performances of "A Midsummer Night's Dream," at the New Theatre, during May. The musical numbers were under the able direction of Herr Ferdinand Neisser.

Leipzig.—The first performance took place, on May 29, at the Stadt-Theater, of an opera, "Dubrowsky," by the Russian composer, Edouard Napravnik, the libretto, from the pen of M. Modest Tschäikowsky, being founded upon a well-known novel by Pushkin. The work is in four acts, and contains some very interesting and effective choral and concerted numbers, while the orchestration is not wanting in originality. It was well received by a numerous audience, Herr Panzer being the conductor.——Robert Schumann will ere long have his monument erected in this town. Herr Werner Stein, the author of the handsome plaster model of a Schumann statue now exhibiting at the Kunst Ausstellung, has been commissioned by an anonymous music-lover to execute it in permanent form with a view to its being presented to the municipality.

Madrid.—Schumann's B flat Symphony was performed here for the first time, on May 20, in one of the orchestral concerts of the Sociedad, and produced so great an impression that it had to be repeated at the following and final concert of the season.——An elaborate work is shortly to be published here from the pen of Professor Silvari, a well-known writer on musical subjects, relating to the popular music of Spain, from a critical and historical point of view, and comprising songs, dances, and musical instruments in popular use in the various provinces of the country. The work cannot fail to prove a most interesting and valuable addition to the literature of musical folk-lore.

Mayence.—Fräulein Jenny Lux, a daughter of the late eminent Mayence organist and well-known composer, Friedrich Lux, has given some organ recitals here recently, and caused something like a sensation by her absolute mastery over the instrument, combined with an altogether irreproachable taste.

Moscow.—The season of the Imperial Musical Society, which has just come to a close, has been a very brilliant and successful one, under the direction of M. Safonow, the successor of Nicolas Rubinstein. Two of the most interesting concerts of the season were devoted to Schubert and Brahms respectively, while the modern French school, represented by Widor, Délibes, Charpentier, and others, likewise obtained a hearing. Amongst Russian composers Tschaïkowsky, Rubinstein, Glazounow, and Rimsky-Korsakoff figured most frequently in the programmes. The orchestra of the Conservatoire also gave twelve concerts during the season, which in every respect has been a most animated one.

Munich.—Professor Ermannsdörfer is said to have resigned the capellmeistership at the Royal Opera, to which he was but recently appointed, and will be, it is said, succeeded by Herr Stavenhagen, of Weimar. The latter conducted a most successful concert some few weeks ago at the Kaim Saal in aid of the projected Wagner monument, when only works by the Bayreuth master and Liszt were in the programme.——Tschaïkowsky's one-act opera "Iolanthe" was produced for the first time at the Royal Opera on May 20, under Capellmeister Roehr's direction, and achieved a distinct success, to which the interpreters of the leading parts, Frau Senger-Bettaque, Herren Mikorey and Gura contributed not a little.

Palermo.—The magnificent new Grand Theatre, one of the finest in Europe, was opened on May 17 with a performance of Verdi's "Falstaff," preceded by the execution of the Italian National Anthem. The architect of the building, Signor Basile, was enthusiastically called for, and had to appear repeatedly to bow his acknowledgments. It was a well-deserved distinction.

Prague.—A new opera, "Perdita," by the young Czech composer, Joseph Nesvara, was brought out at the National Theatre on May 27, and received with much favour. The libretto, a close adaptation of Shakespeare's "A Winter's Tale," is dramatically effective, and the music, while somewhat reminiscent of the younger Verdi, derives its chief interest, as in the case of most modern operatic composers, from its clever instrumentation.——The excellent amateur performance of "Don Giovanni," referred to in our last number, was repeated at the German Theatre on May 28.

Stockholm.—At the Scandinavian Musical Festival held here in Whitsuntide the works produced included those by Norman, Ole Olsen, Wenneiberg, Grieg, Gade, Emil Hartmann, Svendsen, and A. Södermann. There was a choir of 700 voices with an orchestra of 150 executants. Grieg and Svendsen were the principal conductors.

Vienna.—A new ballet in four acts, "The Bride of Corea," the music by J. Bayer, was brought out at the Imperial Theatre on May 22, and received with great favour. The music, by the popular composer of "Die Puppenfee," is throughout characteristic, bright, and pleasing, and the work has been most sumptuously mounted. It has been given many times since and may indeed be said to have scored the only real success amongst the novelties brought out during the season.——On May 29 Herr George Müller, the excellent tenor of the Opera, made his farewell appearance here as Faust in Gounod's opera amidst numerous ovations from the audience. He had been a member of the personnel for thirty years, and retires on a pension.——Herr Wilhelm Kienzl has handed the score of his new opera "Sancho" to the authorities of the Imperial Opera, where it is to be first brought out. —— Signor Leoncavallo has been a visitor here recently, and, on the 1st ult., introduced some excerpts from his new opera, "La Bohème," to an invited audience. To an interviewer of the Neue Freie Presse, the Maëstro confided that he contemplates writing an opera on the subject of "Trilby," the late Du Maurier's novel containing, in his opinion, all the elements, poetic and musical, for the making of an excellent lyrical drama. ——The authorities here, it must be owned, are trying very hard to establish a legal claim on the personal estate of the late Johannes Brahms, which is disputed by the city of Hamburg. The master, it appears, had omitted to have his German passport renewed since 1888. Hence, it is argued, he may have forfeited his Hamburg citizenship.——A handsome monument, erected over the grave of Franz von Suppé, was unveiled last month at the Central Cemetery.

Weimar.—"Dichter und Welt," a first operatic essay by Herr Waldemar von Baussnern, favourably known as a composer of chamber music and of songs, was produced at the Court Theatre on May 28, under Herr Stavenhagen's direction. The new work, which is a musicianly production and pervaded by a healthy idealism, achieved, however, little more than a succès d'estime.

OBITUARY.

We regret to have to record the death of Dr. John Naylor, late organist of York Minster, who died while on a voyage to Australia for the benefit of his health, and was buried at sea, between Teneriffe and the Cape, on May 15. The deceased musician was born at Stanningley, near Leeds, on June 8, 1838, and was therefore in his fifty-ninth year. He commenced his musical career as a chorister at the Leeds Parish Church, when Dr. Samuel S. Wesley, and after him Mr. R. S. Burton, were the organists, and before he had completed his eighteenth year was appointed organist of St. Mary's Church, Scarborough. He gained his Mus. Bac. degree at Oxford in 1863, and that of Mus. Doc. in 1872, and in the following year became organist of All Saints' Church, Scarborough, where, in conjunction with the late Rev. R. Brown-Borthwick, he raised the musical portion of the services to a high standard of excellence. In 1883 Dr. Naylor was selected out of fifty others to succeed Dr. E. G. Monk as organist and choirmaster at York Minster, a position to which, in 1892, on the death of his early instructor, Mr. R. S. Burton, was added the conductorship of the York Musical Society. In 1895 he was unanimously elected an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music. In the early part of the present year, his health having become seriously impaired, he felt it his duty to send in his resignation to the Dean and Chapter. This the latter accepted only conditionally while prolonging his leave of absence until the end of the year, and acknowledging at the same time in the most handsome terms their "indebtedness to Dr. Naylor for the efficiency of the choir during the past fourteen years and for the admirable manner in which the instrumental as well as the vocal music at the Minster has been rendered." His numerous compositions, principally of sacred music, include the cantatas "Jeremiah," "The Brazen Serpent," "Meribah," and "Manna," besides church services, anthems, part-songs, pieces for organ, and his well-known book of chants.

A well-known figure in Leeds musical circles and in the organ world has been removed by the death, at the age of seventy-three, of Dr. William Spark, which took place at Leeds, on the 16th ult. The son of a lay-vicar of Exeter Cathedral, William Spark was born there October 28, 1823, not 1825, as is usually stated. He became a chorister in the Cathedral, and in 1840 was articled to Dr. S. S. Wesley, at that time organist. Spark went with Wesley to Leeds in 1842, where the former was deputy-organist of the Parish Church, and organist successively of Chapeltown Church and St. Paul's, Park Square. He afterwards became organist at Tiverton (Devon) and Daventry (Northampton); but when Wesley removed to Winchester in 1849, Spark returned to Leeds, and was appointed to St. George's Church, a post which he held till his death. He founded the Leeds Madrigal and Motet Society, and the fine organ in the Leeds Town Hall, built by Gray and Davison, was from the design of Henry Smart and the deceased. Spark relates that before the organ was removed from the factory in London a dinner party took place in the swell box, which was large enough to accommodate ten guests, of whom J. W. Davison and Smart were the life of the party. The organ was formally opened April 7, 1859, and after a severe competition, Spark was elected the Borough organist in 1860. The deceased organist, who took his doctor's degree at Dublin in 1861, is widely known by the Organist's Quarterly Journal, a series of organ pieces started in 1869, of which the majority of its best contributions are now included in Novello's "Original Compositions for the Organ." Dr. Spark composed three cantatas, various anthems, part-songs, &c., and edited a large number of organ pieces by Batiste, the French organist. He contributed to the Yorkshire Post, and was the author of "Musical Memories" (1888) and "Musical Reminiscences" (1892). He also compiled an exhaustive but ill-arranged "Life" of his friend Henry Smart. Alderman Frederick R. Spark, the able and energetic secretary of the Leeds Musical Festival, and Mr. Edward J. Spark, of Worcester, are brothers of the late organist.

One of the few remaining links connecting with the old Sacred Harmonic Society has been severed by the death, at the age of sixty-seven, of Mr. Edward Hill Mannering, which occurred at his Hampstead residence on the 13th ult. The deceased became a member of the Sacred Harmonic Society in 1857, and soon after held a seat on the committee, in which connection he had much to do with the Handel Festivals. In the early seventies he was appointed hon. secretary, which post he held till the Society was dissolved. Mr. Mannering, who was greatly esteemed, was well known in commercial circles as manager of the Sun Fire Office.

Carl Mikuli, one of the last surviving pupils of Chopin, died at Lemberg, in Galicia, on May 21, aged seventy-six. Of Polish nationality, he studied medicine at the Viennese University, but eventually gave himself up entirely to the pursuit of musical art, and in 1841 went to Paris, where he became one of the favourite pupils of Chopin and an interpreter par excellence of his master's compositions. After a brilliant, but comparatively brief career as a pianist in France, Germany, Austria, and other Continental parts, he accepted the directorship of the Lemberg Conservatoire in 1858, and devoted himself henceforth to teaching and the composition of a great number of pieces, chiefly for the pianoforte, and all reflecting more or less the style and even the mannerisms of Chopin. His complete edition of the latter's works is justly regarded as a standard one.

The death is announced on May 24, at Moscow, of Paul Pabst, the distinguished director of the Imperial Society of Music, at the age of forty-three. He was a native of Königsberg, receiving his early instruction from his father, an excellent pianist, and when only nine years of age successfully appeared in German concert-rooms. He subsequently studied for some years under Liszt, at Weimar, and in 1878 obtained a professorship at the Moscow Conservatoire, then under the direction of Nicolas Rubinstein, where his teaching was attended by enormous success. He has also made a name as a composer, particularly in Russia, where his transcriptions of Anton Rubinstein's "Le Démon" and Tschaïkowsky's "Eugène Onéguine" have obtained great popularity.

The excellent and widely-known bass singer of the Berlin Opera, Franz Krolop, died in the German capital on May 30, from the after-effects of an operation, aged fifty-eight. He had been a member of the Berlin Royal Theatre since 1872, and excelled in buffo parts, his interpretation of the characters of Papageno and of Figaro in Mozart's operas, or of Giacomo in "Fra Diavolo," being perhaps the best and most refinedly humorous to be met with on the German lyrical stage. He was a native of Bohemia, and studied singing under Levy in Vienna. Krolop, who was also a successful professor at the Berlin Hochschule, had been married to Vilma von Voggenhuber, a dramatic singer of some note, who preceded him in death some ten years.

Max Maretzek, the famous impresario, whose death in New York we briefly recorded in our last number, first became known as assistant to Balfe when that composer was conductor of the old Her Majesty's in 1846. He commenced his career of impresario in the United States in 1847, and was the first to introduce the operas of Gounod, Meyerbeer, and Verdi to America. He accompanied Jenny Lind during her triumphal progress in the States, and was the first American manager of Patti, Lucca, Kellogg, and other famous prime donne. He also tried his hand at composition, and there is extant an opera, "Hamlet," from his pen. During the last few years he had devoted himself very successfully to vocal tuition. Like his celebrated cousin, Maurice Strakosch, he was an Austrian by birth.

Councillor Christian Friedrich Kahnt, a well-known and greatly esteemed Leipzig personality, died in that town on the 5th ult., in his seventy-fifth year. The founder and, up to the year 1886, chief of the well-known Leipzig music publishing firm of C. F. Kahnt, he was the proprietor and, since the death of Brendl, the titular editor of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, the journal founded by Robert Schumann. He was also a member of the standing committee of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Verein from its foundation.

Madame Damcke died in Paris, on the 8th ult., at the age of seventy. An excellent pianist, a former pupil of Henselt, Madame Damcke had, during the lifetime of her husband, one of the most artistic salons in the French capital. Berlioz, Rubinstein, and Stephen Heller were intimate friends of the house, and all the most noted men in the musical world took part in its réunions. Even to the last her house remained an important musical centre. She was a sister-in-law of the celebrated Servais, and consequently the aunt of the composer Franz Servais.

Mr. William Sumner, the organist at Christ's Church, Copse Hill, Wimbledon, died suddenly on Whit-Sunday while officiating at his instrument during evening service. The incident is rendered the more pathetic from the fact that Mr. Sumner was to terminate his appointment on this occasion after holding it for twenty-four years.

We have also to record the following deaths:—

On May 12, at Brünn, Joseph Tertnick, leading tenor at the Stadt-Theater, aged twenty-nine.

On May 14, at Weimar, Frau Helene von Redern, formerly known, under the name of Fräulein von Baja, as a favourite operatic singer.

On May 15, at Berlin, Frau Ida Becker, formerly admired vocalist, composer of songs, sister of Herr Emil Naumann, the well known music historian.

On May 17, at Görlitz, A. Ruscheweyh, banker, distinguished amateur, founder of the Görlitz Philharmonic Society and Singakademie, promoter of Silesian musical festivals, in his seventy-fourth year.

On May 18, at Darmstadt, Court Councillor Theodor Münzer, for many years Intendant of the grand ducal opera.

On May 25, at Southsea, Christopher Gottfried Burck, late Bandmaster 1st Battalion South Wales Borderers, in his seventy-third year.

On May 27, at Berlin, Ferdinand Schulz, organist of the Sophien Kirche, popular composer of vocal quartets, aged seventy-six.

On May 29, at Stettin, August Hart, music teacher, widely known in Germany and Austria as the composer of choral works for male voices.

On May 30, at Paris, Charles Michel, a young laureate of the Conservatoire, organist and composer.

On the 3rd ult., at Bergamo, Napoleone Pontecchi, violoncellist, composer of church music and of several operettas, aged seventy-six.

On the 4th ult., at Berlin, Louis Ucko, once highly popular tenor of the operas of Stuttgart, Vienna, and Budapesth.

On the 4th ult., at Bellagio, Marcello Rossi, violin virtuoso, greatly esteemed in Vienna, where he resided, aged thirty-five.

On the 8th ult., at Mayence, Carl Boetz, formerly secretary to Richard Wagner.

AMENS TO MINOR HYMN-TUNES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—It has often occurred to me that a major ending to the "Amen" after every minor tune is very incongruous. If the hymn is penitential throughout, the major termination has a disturbing effect, and, speaking for myself, jars upon one's feelings. There can be no doubt that to sing "Amen" at the end of every hymn is an absurdity; but we have become so accustomed to its use, regardless of its inappropriateness, that it would be vain to suggest any alteration. But it may not unreasonably be asked, what authority is there for the Tierce de Picardie in the Amens to minor tunes? I am under the impression that the question was raised some years ago at a meeting of the Musical Association, but the chairman, Sir John Stainer, then felt unable to give a definite ruling. Perhaps he, or some other authority on the subject, would kindly enlighten the readers of your excellent journal.—Yours faithfully,

June 11, 1897. Organum.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

T. R. (Wolverhampton).—The "God save the Queen" story is probably the following: Three ladies met at afternoon tea, and, as ladies sometimes do, they began to discuss the merits of their respective husbands. Mrs. A. said: "My husband is not very musical; in fact, he only knows two tunes, one is 'God save the Queen' and the other is the 'Old Hundredth.'" Mrs. B. replied: "Really, how strange, that is like my husband; he knows two tunes, one is 'God save the Queen' and the other isn't." "I am afraid," added Mrs. C., "that my husband is even less musical; he only knows 'God save the Queen' when he sees the people stand up."

W. S. (Leith).—The Opus numbers of Beethoven's "Appassionata," "Moonlight," "Waldstein," and "Kreutzer" sonatas are, respectively, 57, 27 (No. 2), 53, and 47. It should, however, be distinctly understood that these titles were not bestowed by Beethoven, neither did he authorize their use. The "Kreutzer" sonata (so-called) is for pianoforte and violin; the others above referred to are for pianoforte alone.

Pedalist.—Shoes are preferable to boots, because they allow a freer action of the ankle joint, which is a very important factor in good pedal playing.

Pianoforte (Luton).—For full information as to the form of Bach's Prelude and Fugue, No. 1, you cannot do better than consult Dr. Iliffe's "Analysis of Bach's 48 Preludes and Fugues," reviewed in our present number. The work may be obtained in four parts or in one volume.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Annan, N.B.—The seventh annual choral festival of the Dumfries Established Synod Choir Union took place on the 5th ult. The united choirs, numbering about 350 voices, gave an excellent rendering of various "Psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs," under the able direction of Mr. Henry Graves (Dumfries). The anthem was "Sing praises unto the Lord," composed by Mr. W. A. C. Cruickshank. The singing was accompanied by two organs, at which Mr. Stevenson (Dryferdale) and Mr. Dobson (Moffat) respectively presided.

Armagh.—On Tuesday evening, May 25, there was a special shortened service held in the Cathedral, at which a most impressive rendering of Gounod's "Redemption" (Parts 1 and 2) was given. The solos were distributed between the following members of the choir: Masters Blair and Mitchell (sopranos), Messrs. Tarleton and Archer (tenors), and Messrs. Merriman and Dean (basses). The accompaniments were supplied by the organist and choirmaster, Dr. T. Osborne Marks. The very large congregation, which completely filled the sacred edifice, proved that previous services of the kind—Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," on the Feast of the Conversion of St. Paul, and Stainer's "Crucifixion," during Lent—were most thoroughly appreciated.

Bristol.—Master Frank Merrick, aged eleven, the son of Dr. Frank Merrick, a well-known local professor, gave a pianoforte recital at the Victoria Rooms, on the 1st ult. This talented boy, who made public appearances two years ago, performed from memory such works as Beethoven's Sonata in D (Op. 28), Schubert's Impromptu in A flat (Op. 90, No. 4), and other works, including a Berceuse and Tarantella from his own pen. He also played Beethoven's Concerto in C (No. 1), in which he introduced a neat cadenza of his own composition. Master Merrick's success was unquestionable, and the boy richly deserved all the encores and recalls he received from a large and greatly enthusiastic audience. His future career will be watched with interest.

Burry Port (Carmarthen).—An Eisteddfod, in aid of Elliott's brass band, held on Whit-Monday, proved to be a great success from every point of view. The attendance was large, the singing was of a very high order, and the adjudicator's awards gave general satisfaction. The chief choral competition, consisting of £20 and a chair, was won by the Christ Church Choir, Llanelly, under the leadership of Mr. David Roberts.

Congresbury (Somerset).—The annual festival service of the Axbridge and District Association of Church Choirs was held in Congresbury Parish Church on the 2nd ult., and proved to be most satisfactory. The Rev. H. Toft conducted, and Mr. Herbert Lloyd presided at the organ.

Dorchester.—A festival of parish choirs was held at Holy Trinity Church on the 10th ult. A special feature of the service was the invaluable aid of an efficient orchestra, the players being placed on a raised platform on the South-East transept of the chancel. Amongst the performers were several of the fair sex, including one who played a double-bass. Smart's Evening Service was sung and also Stainer's fine anthem "Lord, Thou art God." Mr. Boyton Smith presided at the organ, and Mr. W. Stone was the leader of the orchestra.——Mr. Boyton Smith was recently presented with a handsome gold watch and chain, bearing the following inscription: "Presented to Mr. Boyton Smith, Conductor of the Dorchester Vocal Association, 1870-1896, on his retirement." In acknowledging the gift, Mr. Boyton Smith gave some pleasant recollections of past musical doings in Dorchester, his native town, where his brother, the late Mr. Sydney Smith, the well-known composer for the pianoforte, was also born.

Fowey.—Jubilee Thanksgiving Services were held in the Parish Church of St. Fimbarrus on the 20th ult., when Smart's Te Deum in F, Sullivan's Jubilate in D, Hopkins's Cantate in B flat, and Handel's "Hallelujah" were rendered by the choir. On the 22nd ult., at a special service, the members of the Fowey Choral Society sang Costa's arrangement of the National Anthem, Mozart's "Gloria" (12th Mass), Cowen's "All hail the glorious reign," &c. Mr. C. E. Juleff, the organist of the church, directed the music on both occasions.

Holmfirth.—The annual public "sing" took place on "Feast" Sunday, May 30, when 3,000 people assembled in the field where the performance was held. Choruses from "The Messiah," many hymns, and the National Anthem were splendidly rendered by a band and chorus of about 160 performers. Mr. Will Battye was the conductor and Mr. Hinchliffe Battye the leader of the orchestra. This characteristic gathering of Yorkshire folk in one of their delightful valleys was most successful.

Horsham.—The festival in connection with the Horsham and District Choral Union was held on the 3rd ult., at St. Mary's Parish Church. The united choirs numbered nearly 250 voices. Professor Bridge's "Great and marvellous are Thy works" furnished the anthem. Mr. J. G. Buttifant was an efficient choirmaster.——The Horsham Musical Society has presented its conductor, Mr. F. C. Moore (who is leaving the town), with an illuminated address and silver salver "as a mark of their esteem and recognition of his valuable services as honorary conductor, from October, 1894, to April, 1897."

Leeds.—Mr. Charles Alexander and Mr. Alfred Taylor gave an invitation song and pianoforte recital, on the 14th ult., at the College of Music. They were assisted by some of their most promising pupils. On the 18th ult. Mr. Herbert Lunn, assisted by some of his pupils, gave an invitation pianoforte recital. The pupils attained a high standard throughout.

Machen (Monmouth).—The third annual Whit-Tuesday Eisteddfod was, as usual, very largely attended, and as there were over 200 entries for the various competitions the interest in the contests was exceptionally keen. The adjudicators were Mr. E. Evans (Builth) and Mr. Tom Stephens (Rhonnda) for music, and Mr. E. B. Newman (Newport) for brass bands. The new Tredegar choir, conducted by Mr. H. Smith, won the chief choral competition.

Maidstone.—Miss Bertha Henniker, medalist of the Royal Academy of Music, gave her second violin recital at the Town Hall, on May 27, with highly successful results. The programme included Gade's Sonata for violin and pianoforte (Op. 21), in which the fair violinist was associated with Dr. Henniker; a violoncello solo, "Air and Gavotte," by Bach, well played by Miss M. Henniker; and vocal solos acceptably contributed by Miss Winifred Betts, Miss Elsie Marshall, and Miss E. L. Bennett. A varied selection of violin solos, which displayed Miss Bertha Henniker's powers to the greatest advantage, completed a very enjoyable concert.

Malton.—Mr. George T. Patman gave a pianoforte recital and matinée at the Assembly Rooms, on May 28, when he played Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto and Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor. Miss Adelaide Lambe and Mr. J. B. Smith were the vocalists, and Miss Zoé Mercier, a very promising pianist, also assisted.

Melbourne (Australia).—The Musical Society of Victoria held its monthly meeting on May 1, at the Royal Arcade Rooms. The President, Mr. E. A. Jäger, made appropriate reference to the death of Johannes Brahms, and read some extracts from Hadow's excellent "Studies in Modern Music," in which the late composer's work and influence are admirably criticised. After the transaction of business an interesting programme was performed, the principal pieces being Mendelssohn's Sonata in B flat for pianoforte and violoncello, and Goetz's Trio in G minor (Op. 1), played by Messrs. Thomas J. Hammond and Claude Harrison, with the addition of Mr. Henry Curtis as violinist in the trio. The latter work has not been heard in Melbourne for some time, and its performance gave great pleasure to the audience, by whom it was greatly applauded. Miss Charlotte Stokes was heard in Beethoven's Variations in F (Op. 34), and Mr. C. Blanchard sang with acceptance English songs by Shield, Dibdin, and Mellor.

Paisley.—Fully 20,000 people are said to have assembled on the Braes of Gleniffer on the 5th ult., the occasion of the open-air concert to celebrate the Tannahill anniversary and to raise money for the building fund of the Paisley new Infirmary, whereby about £300 was obtained. Mr. James Barr, conductor of the Choral Union, directed the performance in this romantic spot, and native hearts were thrilled by the renderings of songs by Burns, Tannahill, and other worthy Scots. The band and pipers of the 1st Battalion Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders, under the conductorship of Mr. M. Hill, added to the attraction of this great gathering.

Scarborough.—Mr. George T. Patman's concert at the old Town Hall, on May 28, proved an attractive function. The concert-giver, who played selections from Schumann and Chopin with much acceptance, was ably assisted by Miss Adelaide Lambe, Mr. J. B. Smith (vocalists), Miss Alderson-Smith (violoncello), Mr. W. H. Cass (violin), Miss Zoé Mercier (pianoforte), and Miss Darwin's mandoline and guitar band.

Truro.—The annual festival of Truro Diocesan Choral Union took place in the Cathedral on the 15th ult., and was quite as successful as any which have preceded it. The beautiful evening service in F, by Dr. C. H. Lloyd, precentor of Eton, was rendered with precision and taste. But the feature of the festival was undoubtedly the magnificent anthem of Sir J. Stainer, "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Zion," one of the composer's finest works, which, in spite of manifest difficulties, was most effectively done. The united choirs, numbering 750 voices, were under the able conductorship of Dr. Monk, of the Cathedral, with Revs. W. M. la Touche, of Phillack, and W. W. Bickford, of Treslothan, as sub-conductors. Mr. Ernest Hawke, of Truro, presided at the organ.

Wells.—The festival of the Bath and Wells Diocesan Choral Association was held in the Cathedral on the 17th ult., when the united choirs numbered 766 voices. The processional hymn was "God of Abraham praise," and when the choirs had taken their places "God save the Queen" was sung in unison with splendid effect. Garrett's evening service was followed by Stainer's "O clap your hands," which proved to be a great achievement, being sung with a confidence that was very gratifying. The solos, by Cathedral choristers, Messrs. Burrell and Sharman, were exquisitely sung. Mr. Percy C. Buck, organist of the Cathedral, ably presided at his instrument.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. Alfred J. Miller, Organist and Choirmaster to St. George the Martyr, Queen Square.—Mr. E. W. Baker, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Michael and All Angels', Halton, Tring.—Mr. Oswald S. Spark, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Michael's Church, Worcester.—Mr. Thomas Hogg, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Paul's Church, Blackpool.—Mr. E. W. Bristow, to Emmanuel Church, Harrow Road, Paddington.—Mr. George C. Richardson, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Augustine's, Highbury.—Mr. W. E. Sanderson, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Stephen's, Walthamstow.

THE ROLLING SEASONS.

A New Harvest Cantata. By CALEB SIMPER.

Price 1s. 6d. net. Tonic Sol-fa, 1s. net.

Band Parts are also printed for Strings, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon, 2 Horns, 2 Cornets, 2 Trombones, Timpani, and Organ.

With the exception of Two Hymns and a Carol, the words are selected from the Holy Scriptures. The music, both Vocal and Instrumental, is attractive, interesting, and not difficult. It requires Four Soloists and Full Chorus, and occupies 35 minutes in performance. This Cantata may be rendered with Organ Accompaniment only, but the Orchestral Parts add greatly to the effect. It is especially suitable for Church use at Harvest-tide.

OPINIONS:—"We are all charmed with Cantata. My choir like it so much."—"The 'Rolling Seasons' is splendid."—"Cantata is delightful. I am sure it will have a large sale."—"We have Cantata in rehearsal, and like it very much."—"Cantata is bold, effective, and unique; we are much pleased with it."—"'Rolling Seasons' is exceedingly pretty."—"I like Cantata much, and shall prepare it for Whitsuntide."—"I am simply charmed with the Cantata; you have certainly achieved a great success."—"I consider it a ring studded with Gems."—"A perfect specimen of what a Cantata should be," &c.

RUTH

SUITABLE FOR USE IN PLACES OF WORSHIP

EDWARD OXENFORD.

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

SUITABLE FOR

THANKSGIVING SERVICES.

"The Biblical story of which Ruth is the central figure lends itself with remarkable suitability to an illustration of a harvest celebration. The country landscape, the ripened corn, the sturdy reapers, the standing sheaves, the active gleaners, and the busy farmer, all combine to fill the mind's eye with a pleasant scene of excitement. Set to music by a competent composer such as Mr. A. R. Gaul, the narrative of Ruth's eventful episode lends itself to a pathetic, picturesque, and pleasant performance. The bereaved and sorrowful trio of women on whom the calamity of poverty and famine has fallen, as if to give intensity to their greater grief, and the unexpected and happy influence of patriarchal benevolence displayed by the mighty Boaz, who so quickly transforms sorrow into joy, are all introduced and aptly take their allotted place in the melodious music of Gaul's interpretation of the tale."—Gloucester Citizen.

PERFORMED IN THE TOWN HALL, BIRMINGHAM, ON TWELVE OCCASIONS.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s.; ditto, paper boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 4s.

MARY HUTCHINSON

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"These delightful songs were written and composed for, and are affectionately dedicated to, the children of the Kindergarten Section of the Church of England College for Girls at Edgbaston. Were there naught else to recommend them, the six titles would invite for the songs universal acceptance. Who could resist 'Haymakers,' 'Fairy Bells,' 'Flower Fairies,' 'The English Flag,' 'Calling the Cows,' and 'Fishermen'? We confess to a desire to see some of these songs done as the accompanying 'rubric' suggests. In 'Haymakers' the boys should be scythe-carriers, their action that of mowing; the little girls should imitate raking. This, with the quaint and pretty melody, and the refrain, 'Work, work, clearly we call; work, work, steadily all,' must be a grateful vision to parents, and a pleasant recreation to children, who may thank their stars that they have been born in a day which has a Mary Hutchinson and an Alfred R. Gaul to further gild the golden hours of childhood."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

THE DREAM OF ENDYMION

SCENA FOR TENOR

J. BENNETT

MUSIC BY

FREDERIC H. COWEN.

Vocal Score, price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

THE TIMES.

Mr. Cowen has found in a famous passage of Keats's "Endymion" his inspiration for a wholly successful tenor scena called "The Dream of Endymion," in which the grace for which he has long been famous is prominent from beginning to end. The work is full of imagination, and what may be called the leading theme, taken as representative of the object of Endymion's adoration, is subjected to treatment that is always interesting. The composer has of late given us nothing of equal charm, nor anything so grateful to the singer.

STANDARD.

A new scena for tenor voice, "The Dream of Endymion," by Mr. F. H. Cowen, won cordial approbation. The eloquent words have received a noble setting, and the piece received the fullest justice from Mr. Ben Davies.

MORNING POST.

"The Dream of Endymion" is a fanciful composition in Mr. Cowen's best style, effectively written for the voice, and admirably orchestrated. It was beautifully sung by Mr. Ben Davies, who shared with the composer the loud applause that greeted the conclusion of the work.

DAILY NEWS.

Mr. Cowen, both from a melodic and a dramatic point of view, has given us of his best.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Mr. Cowen must be credited with a melodious and tasteful work, in the interpretation of which Mr. Ben Davies was eminently successful.

ENGLISH FANTASIA

"IN COMMEMORATION"

FOR FULL ORCHESTRA

COMPOSED BY

EDWARD GERMAN.

String Parts, Five Shillings and Sixpence.
Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

Beyond the essentially English style of his "English Fantasia," as it is also called, Mr. Edward German has introduced nothing that is not original, so that there is no reason why the charming work should not be heard frequently after this year's festival is over. It well deserves a place in the regular repertory of English compositions, for it is most vigorous and spontaneous. The workmanship of all three movements is admirable, and the thematic material happily invented. The composer, who conducted, was recalled twice at the close.

STANDARD.

There is considerable Wagnerian feeling in this rather rhapsodical work, which is alternately warlike and peaceful in manner. The Fantasia, which is, unquestionably, very clever, was warmly received.

MORNING POST.

In writing his Fantasia Mr. German has evidently had Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" in his mind, and has striven to produce a sort of British equivalent to that gorgeous musical glorification of the German Empire. He has not made use of any national melodies, but has preferred to rely upon his own inspiration. The scoring is extremely clever, although the percussion instruments are somewhat unduly prominent. Very quaint is the second section, with its solo for the cor anglais.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

The "English Fantasia" is bright and spirited, thoroughly national in character, and very effectively scored. The audience were so pleased with it that they twice recalled the composer.

THE FLAG OF ENGLAND

BALLAD

FOR SOPRANO SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

THE MUSIC BY

SIR J. FREDERICK BRIDGE.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

Tonic Sol-fa, 9d. Words only, 12s. 6d. per 100. String Parts, 4s. 6d. Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

The vocal writing is decidedly effective. The work is undeniably above the average of "occasional" compositions, and is indeed worthy to rank with the composer's best efforts.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Dr. Bridge was well advised in selecting the poem as a text for his Jubilee Song. Good judgment equally appears in the musical treatment. Manifestly a work designed for the purpose here in view should be distinguished by features which recommend it to popular taste and feeling—that is to say, it should be tuneful, rhythmical, and simple. These are precisely the qualities that recommend the work under notice, and they are quite compatible with a large measure of picturesque effect and varied expression. . . . The picturesque poem and its happy setting, so full of spirit and fitness, at once pleased the public. The performance was indeed excellent, making quite justifiable the "ovation" promptly tendered to the principal singer and the composer-conductor. Dr. Bridge was thrice called to the platform.

STANDARD.

It opens with a martial figure on the dominant of F major, and this is heard again and again throughout the brief work. The "Winds of the World" are to declare "What is the Flag of England?" and they perform their task, Professor Bridge's music well illustrating, with all requisite variety of effect and musicianly feeling, the contrasts between the soft southern zephyrs and the wild north-easter. In the final section the vocal forces, including the soprano soloist, are divided into nine parts, and the climax is as stirring as it is musicianly instructive. The "Flag of England" is certain to prove popular with choral societies, for Professor Bridge's music is grateful for the voices, and the words are not more applicable to this than to any other year, being patriotic in a general sense.

DAILY NEWS.

The music, strictly choral, is of a descriptive character, admirably suited to the dramatic lines, while in the song of the South Wind, the soprano soloist (last night, Madame Albani) has a melodious solo supported by the female chorus, and the whole closes with a short but massive double chorus. The choir had evidently taken the greatest interest in the music of their chief, and the performance was well worthy the fame of our leading choral society. Four times was Professor Bridge called to the platform.

MORNING POST.

The finest portion of the work is undoubtedly the illustration of the words of the North Wind, and the music here attains very great expressive power, particularly in the setting of the line "And they died, but the flag of England blew free ere the spirit passed." . . . No little of the success of the work is due to the effectiveness of the scoring, which is always picturesque, and often most suggestive of the spirit of the text. . . . Few new works have had a more hearty reception.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

It may at once be said that the composer has thoroughly caught the spirit of the stirring and picturesque poem. . . . It is a thoroughly musicianlike production, and of its effectiveness there can be no question. That it will speedily be in demand by choral societies is certain, for it is marked by a freshness and energy not always apparent in compositions of this description. The large force of brass and percussion employed last night is not absolutely necessary to do justice to a work that has far more valid claims to attention than is indicated by liberal orchestral adjuncts. The choralists did their very best for their conductor's latest production, and the result was a great success.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

The recurrent themes are marked by breadth and simplicity rather than distinction or nobility, but some of the episodes, notably the setting of the splendid lines "Never the lotus closes, never the wild fowl wake, But a soul goes out on the East wind that died for England's sake"—are decidedly happy. The work was finely performed and was received with great enthusiasm.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

The setting has spirit, intelligence, and a fine literary instinct. It has movement and spirit; it is, on the whole, well scored, and if it does not ever touch you into any sudden surprise of beauty—which is, let it fairly be said, the final test of great art—it is at all events sound, musicianly and inspiriting, and not unworthy of the poem.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

Dr. Bridge is to be cordially congratulated upon his capital setting of Rudyard Kipling's fine ballad "The Flag of England." It was no light undertaking, indeed, to find the musical equivalent of Mr. Kipling's noble and stirring verses; but Dr. Bridge may certainly be felicitated upon the fashion in which he has accomplished his task. The utterances of the rough North wind, anon of the languorous southern breezes, and so on, he has illustrated with much picturesque and effective scoring. The work was admirably performed, and was received with the utmost enthusiasm by a very large audience.

GLOBE.

The composer has evidently put forth all his strength in setting the fine verses of the poem. . . . His music is always vigorous and full of spirit, and every bar shows the intelligence of a thorough musician. In his setting of the fine lines beginning "Never the lotus closes," Dr. Bridge has succeeded in catching some of the pathos of the poem; this passage was perhaps the best of a work in which, if space allowed, there would be much to praise at length.

ATHENÆUM.

This brief and invigorating cantata, written for soprano solo, chorus, and orchestra, will certainly be popular for years, as it is impressive in effect and not by any means difficult, though the music is as varied in style as it is energetic.

SUNDAY TIMES.

Dr. Bridge could have adopted no more fitting model for a work of this description than Stanford's "Revenge," the popularity of which it ought certainly to rival for a time at any rate. The music is full of rhythmical energy, and its tuneful swing catches the ear forthwith.

WEEKLY DISPATCH.

Dr. Bridge's setting of Rudyard Kipling's stirring ballad, "The Flag of England," was an immense success, and the composer was recalled time after time to the orchestra to bow his acknowledgments.

WORLD.

I venture to say that this musical ballad will win wide success, and that the choral societies of the two Isles will fall upon it with one accord. They can't do better.

TRUTH.

Professor Bridge's setting of "The Flag of England" quite roused the Albert Hall audience to enthusiasm.

THE VILLAGE ORGANIST

A Series of Pieces for Church and General Use

EDITED BY

J. STAINER

AND

F. CUNNINGHAM WOODS.

PRICE ONE SHILLING EACH BOOK.

PREFACE.

THERE exists already an abundant supply of original compositions and arrangements suitable for performance on large and comprehensive organs, but the many organists who have only a small instrument at their disposal in country churches often have some difficulty in finding short and easy Voluntaries suitable for their own use and the instruction of their pupils. It is hoped that "The Village Organist" (which will be issued in shilling numbers) may supply this want, so much felt by that valuable and zealous class of church-workers to whom the work is inscribed. The Editors have endeavoured to bring together a collection of pieces which they trust will prove to be at once simple, without being uninteresting, and effective where the instrumental resources are limited.

His singing of 'Angels ever bright and fair' was also a genuine treat, and evoked the warmest enthusiasm."—Ballymena Weekly Telegraph, April 10, 1897.

SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE.

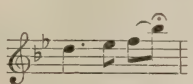
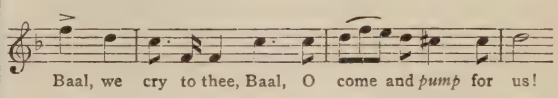
Westminster Abbey, with its rich historic associations, the noble splendour of its stately architecture, the fragrant memory of its illustrious dead, and the affecting strains of its echoing music, is ever a source of magnetic attraction and delightful contemplation. The ordinary visitor to the "hallowed fane" rarely seeks out those pleasant nooks and corners of the venerable pile which exercise such a fascinating spell upon those who can appreciate their characteristic quaintness. One such secluded spot is known as the "Little Cloisters," which, with its fountain-centred and tree-shaded quadrangle, is environed with an old-world charm of peculiar interest. Here, in the days that are long past, was the Monks' Infirmary. Dr. John Wilson (1594-1673), a Professor of Music at Oxford, is buried in its east walk; and tradition here assigns the place of sepulture of Henry Lawes, Milton's "tuneful Harry," though the exact spot of his interment is unknown. Charles Kingsley's house is on the south side, and adjoining it is the official residence of the organist of the Abbey. Entering, from the dark cloister, the narrow doorway of the ancient Litlington Tower (named after the Abbot of that name, who died in 1386), we are within the pleasant habitation of the Abbey's "chief musician." We are at once struck with the tower staircase, upon the walls of which are hung portraits of former Abbey organists—from Purcell to Turle—which Sir Frederick Bridge has assiduously collected. A relic of the past is the hole in the massive wall, having a stone flue, its base scooped as a receptacle for oil and wick, which served to lighten weary monks on their way from refectory to dormitory. But we must turn from the dead past to the living present, and, in the cosy study overlooking the fountain (the lower window on the left of our illustration), learn from his own lips some of the life incidents of the present organist of Westminster Abbey.



John Frederick Bridge was born at Oldbury, near Birmingham, December 5, 1844. Six years later his father became a Vicar-Choral of Rochester, at the munificent salary of £50 per annum! and thither the family removed. Very shortly after, at the tender age of six, little Frederick was admitted into the Cathedral choir as a "practising boy" (i.e., a probationer). The organist was then the late and kindly Dr. J. L. Hopkins, afterwards of Trinity College, Cambridge, who many years after said to him, "Ah! perhaps if I had rejected you then, how different would have been your career." The education, both musical and general, of chorister boys is very different now from what it was fifty years ago. At Rochester, the rudiments were taught by one of the vicars-choral, who corrected all faults, even of bad vocal production, by pulling the boys' ears, and "pretty hard he pulled." The general education of the boys was anything but wide in its scope. However, "You'll learn enough to carry you through the world," said the master to those Rochester choristers, who at that time and shortly after included the future organists of the Cathedrals of Durham (Professor Armes), Ripon (Dr. Crow), Exeter (Dr. Wood), Chester

MASTER J. F. BRIDGE. AGED 9.

(Dr. Joseph C. Bridge), and of Westminster Abbey (Sir Frederick Bridge). Many boyish pranks, of which the cane invariably formed a striking coda, could be related did space permit. Sir Frederick speaks with affection of his first master, Dr. J. L. Hopkins, an old Westminster Abbey chorister, whose cousins, the veterans Dr. E. J. Hopkins, of the Temple Church, and Mr. John Hopkins, of Rochester, are still active, and whose nephew is Mr. Edward Lloyd, the eminent tenor. Dr. J. L. Hopkins had a horror of "bawling," and was very angry when the wife of one of the canons said that the boys "bawled." This lady was a terror to Master Bridge when he began to play part of the service, as she always complained of the "noise" he made; but she took the precaution to send the verger to make sure that it was Bridge, and not his master, who was playing, before she uttered her complaint.



Sir Frederick Bridge has played a prominent part in the obsequies of great men, such as Darwin, Browning, and Tennyson, and at memorial services of many other distinguished personages. His first experience in the way of paying honour to the great dead occurred in 1852, when he assisted to toll the Cathedral bell at the death of the Duke of Wellington. "I should like to be able to say that I helped to toll for the Duke of Wellington," said the little eight-year-old chorister to the blind bell-ringer of Rochester Cathedral; and who could refuse such a request? Bridge, being a junior boy, to his great regret was not one of the two Rochester choristers selected to sing at the great Duke's funeral at St. Paul's; but the music which Goss composed for the occasion was rehearsed at Rochester. So vivid was the impression made on that young mind by the dirge "Know ye not that a Prince and a great man is fallen this day in Israel?" that when, twenty-nine years later, he had to prepare the music for the memorial service of Lord Beaconsfield, he suggested this anthem to Dean Stanley. Upon being told for what occasion it had been composed, the Dean observed that the death of Lord Beaconsfield had made a greater impression on the public mind than the death of any great man since Wellington. It is also interesting to record that this most appropriate dirge was sung at the Dean's own funeral in the Abbey, July 25, 1881. When he was nine years old, Master Bridge and his father sang under Costa at the opening, by the Queen, of the Crystal Palace on June 10, 1854. Clara Novello sang the solo in the National Anthem, and, confirming the testimony of Sir George Grove, Sir Frederick says that "her clear, beautiful voice still seems to ring in my ears." She added an ornamental note on the word "us"— and as she lingered on the high B flat, an old gentleman sitting behind the young chorister enthusiastically exclaimed, "That's a beauty!"

But to return to Rochester. One of Bridge's fellow choristers and most attached friends was the lamented Joseph Maas, whose premature death robbed us of a lovely tenor voice and a charming man. Maas was very fond of fishing, and it was from him that Bridge first gained that love of piscatorial sport to which he is now so keenly devoted and in which he is so skilful. Maas possessed a singularly beautiful boy's voice. He, with Bridge as his accompanist, would often sing at a canon's dinner party, one of his favourite songs being the setting of Tennyson's "The Brook," by Dolores, the rippling accompaniment of which Master Bridge was very proud of playing.

Sir Frederick's first acquaintance with the organ was in the humble capacity of organ-blower! His fellow chorister, Armes (now the distinguished organist of Durham Cathedral), used to practise Bach's "St. Ann's" Fugue, and, by way of variety, "Baal, we cry to thee," from Mendelssohn's "Elijah." On such occasions the blower—or shall we say the future conductor of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society—and his assistant would, while still blowing, sing—

The next step in the organic ladder was when he sat by Master Armes while the future Durham organist nervously played a Cathedral service. When Armes nodded his head Bridge had to push in the pedal coupler, and when he nodded again, Bridge had to pull it out! Soon after he was fourteen, young Bridge, who had not a strong voice, left the choir and was articled to Mr. John Hopkins, the present veteran organist of Rochester, for whom he would occasionally take the service.

Sir Frederick Bridge's first organ appointment was at Shorne, a village between Rochester and Gravesend. He had to walk both ways, and in all weathers, the intervening five miles on Sundays, and used to eat his dinner in the vestry. Gad's Hill Place was on the high road to Shorne, and the young organist would often meet Charles Dickens walking along with his dogs. How little either of them thought, as they passed one another on that quiet country road, that in after years the great novelist would repose in Westminster Abbey, and that its "pealing organ" would be manipulated by the fingers of the boy organist who gazed upon the author of "Pickwick" with feelings of admiration and curiosity. In 1862, after a year's experience of a village church, Bridge became organist of Strood Parish Church, he being then eighteen years of age. His vicar was the Ven. J. W. Sheringham, now Archdeacon of Gloucester, of whom Sir Frederick has pleasant recollections.

After three years at Strood, "Mr." Bridge determined to leave home, which he did on obtaining (in 1865) the appointment of organist at Holy Trinity Church, Windsor. He then became conscious of how little he knew about composition, and placed himself under the tuition of John Goss. "Very happy and improving lessons they were," says Sir Frederick, "and it is impossible for me to over-estimate the value of the instruction given by that dear, simple-minded musician." Musically speaking, Sir Frederick is a great grandson of Mozart! Here is the pupilage pedigree: Mozart — Attwood — Goss — Bridge. It is, therefore, in the natural order of things that Attwood's harmony exercises, endorsed with Mozart's interesting and amusing corrections, should have passed, through the late Lady Goss, into the hands of the Abbey organist. Need we say that they are amongst his most precious possessions?

During his Windsor period Sir Frederick passed the examination for the Fellowship of the Royal College of Organists in 1867, and in the following year took his Mus. Bac. degree at Oxford. The charms of a residence in the Royal Borough were not even sufficient to satisfy the ambitions of this young enthusiast. He desired above all else to become a Cathedral organist. With perfect frankness he relates how that some expected appointments became *dis*appointments. At last he obtained his heart's desire when, at the age of twenty-four, he successfully competed for the organistship of Manchester Cathedral. "I shall never forget," he says, "the feeling of joy I experienced when I opened the telegram conveying the welcome news that I had a Cathedral!" He commenced his duties at Manchester on April 16, 1869; and during the six years' tenure of his office he took his Mus. Doc. degree at Oxford (in 1874), besides being Professor of Harmony at Owens College. Cottonopolis was exchanged for the metropolis in 1875, when, at the age of thirty, the organist of Manchester Cathedral was appointed Permanent Deputy-Organist of Westminster Abbey. It should be distinctly understood that from that time he was practically organist and master of the choristers, though he could not assume the full title of organist until the death of his predecessor, Mr. James Turle, which occurred in 1882. We may recall the words relating to Sir Frederick's appointment which appeared at the time (September, 1875) in the pages of this journal:

The appointment of Dr. Bridge to the post of organist at Westminster Abbey—vacant by the retirement of Mr. Turle—will be welcomed by all interested in the cause of church music. The improvement in the services at Manchester Cathedral since Dr. Bridge has held the position of organist, may be regarded as a proof that in the responsible office which he has now accepted he will do his utmost to advance the character of the music in the Abbey; and we sincerely hope that the Dean and Chapter will allow him that unlimited power over the choir which may enable him to raise it to the high state of efficiency which the public has a right to expect.

SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE'S HOUSE IN THE "LITTLE CLOISTERS," WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

With a seat at the Abbey organ and his doctor's degree, it might be thought that Dr. Bridge, as he was then called, had no more worlds to conquer. But he has since been appointed Professor of Harmony and Counterpoint at the Royal College of Music; Gresham Professor of Music (in 1890); and, more recently (in 1896), conductor of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society. In acknowledgment of the important services he rendered at the Queen's Jubilee Service in Westminster Abbey, June 21, 1887—on which occasion he arranged all the music and composed a special anthem—Sir Frederick received the Jubilee medal; and the Queen has recently sent him the clasp, on which is inscribed "1897," to commemorate her Diamond Jubilee. His latest distinction—that of knighthood, conferred upon him by Her Majesty the Queen—comes as a fitting reward for a life well and industriously spent in the cause of music.

Sir Frederick Bridge is a musician of remarkable versatility. His daily work at the Abbey is too well known to be described. As a teacher it is sufficient to state that he has trained a number of young men who, in occupying important spheres of work, have done him infinite credit. As a lecturer he has had remarkable success, and many thousands of people have derived keen enjoyment and not a little information at his popular Gresham lectures, where the episodes—the professor's jokes, even the bad ones!—have not been the least attractive feature. We must also refer to his excellent work in the examination-room of the Royal College of Organists, the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, London, and Durham; and this year he is an examiner for Oxford, Durham, and Victoria Universities.

Sir Frederick has not been idle with his pen. His compositions include the oratorio "Mount Moriah" (composed for his degree of Doctor of Music); the "Repentance of Nineveh," a dramatic oratorio; "Rock of Ages," set to a Latin version by Mr. Gladstone; the "Cradle of Christ," a canticle for Christmas; "Hymn to the Creator"; the "Lord's Prayer"; the cantatas "Boadicea," "Callirhoë," and "The Inchcape Rock"; an overture, "Morte d'Arthur"; and many anthems, services, part-songs, (including his successful setting of Tennyson's "Crossing the Bar"), songs, &c. His "Counterpoint" and other primers have had extraordinary success, many thousands having been sold. His latest work, "The Flag of England," set to Mr. Rudyard Kipling's stirring poem, was enthusiastically received on the occasion of its first performance, at the Royal Albert Hall, on May 6 last, at a Concert in commemoration of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee, for which it was specially composed.

It is not easy to portray Sir Frederick's interesting personality. Quick, shrewd, highly strung, intensely practical, and resourceful to a degree, bubbling over with genial humour—these are some of the characteristics of this successful musician. He is a veritable Sydney Smith in his profession, and it is impossible to be in his presence very long without being amused at his ready wit and his clever powers of caricature. But below this surface vivacity there runs a strong undercurrent of deep feeling, indicative that "Westminster Bridge"—as he is often playfully called—is a right good-hearted fellow. May his career furnish an incentive to many a young musical student, and may he live long to enjoy the regard of his friends and the success which he has so deservedly won.

HANDEL AND HIS LIBRETTIST.

Dr. Thomas Morell (1703-1784), the great classical scholar, was one of Handel's friends. "His knowledge of music," says the "Dictionary of National Biography," "was considerable, and he played the organ with some skill." He preached a sermon on "The Use and Importance of Music in the Sacrifice of Thanksgiving," at Worcester, September 3, 1746, at the Anniversary Meeting of the Three Choirs. In it he declares that: "To know Music, is to know the natural Order of Things: For all Nature, or the Universe, is perfect Harmony." According to the "Dictionary" named above, "Morell supplied the libretti for 'Judas Maccabæus,' 1746; 'Alexander Balus,' 1748; 'Joshua,' 1748; 'Solomon,' 1749; 'Theodora,' 1750; 'Jephtha,' 1752; 'Gideon,' 1754; and 'The Triumph of Time and Truth,' 1758."

Now "Gideon," as will be seen from the subjoined letter, was apparently prepared, not for Handel, but for J. C. Smith. Schoelcher speaks of the work as having been produced in 1769. And, again, according to this letter the worthy Doctor seems scarcely to have written the text of "Joshua" and of "Solomon." Had he done so, one would expect to find them named. "Nabal, an Oratorio, 4to, London, 1764. It was performed at Covent Garden, the words being adapted to several compositions of Handel," is another quotation from the "Dictionary," concerning a work to which reference is made. The text was printed in 1764 for Benjamin Dod, at the Bible and Key, in Ave-Mary-Lane, Ludgate St.

"Circa 1764," a long letter was written by Dr. Morell to some person not mentioned. It has been published only this year by the Historical Manuscripts Commission in their Fifteenth Report, Appendix, Part II., in which are printed the manuscripts of J. Eliot Hodgkin, Esq., F.S.A., of Richmond, Surrey. In the opening lines reference is made to another "Three Choirs" sermon, preached at Hereford in 1747, and then the letter continues thus:—

"And now as to Oratorio's:—'There was a 'time (says Mr. Addison), when it was laid 'down as a maxim, that nothing was capable 'of being well set to musick, that was not 'nonsense.' And this I think, though it might be wrote before Oratorio's were in fashion, supplies an Oratorio-writer (if he may be called a writer) with some sort of apology; especially if it be considered, what alterations he must submit to, if the Composer be of an haughty disposition, and has but an imperfect acquaintance with the English language. As to myself, great a lover as I am of music, I should never have thought of such an undertaking (in which, for the reasons above, little or no credit is to be gained), had not Mr. Handell applied to me, when at Kew, in 1746, and added to his request the honour of a recommendation from Prince Frederic. Upon this I thought I could do as well as some who had gone before me, and within 2 or three days carried him the first Act of Judas Macchabæus, which he approved of. 'Well,' says he, 'and how are you to go on?' 'Why, we are to suppose an engagement, and 'that the Israelites have conquered, and so 'begin with a chorus as

'Fallen is the Foe

'or, something like it.' 'No, I will have this,' and began working it, as it is, upon the Harpsichord. 'Well, go on.' 'I will bring you more to-morrow.' 'No, something now,

'So fall thy Foes, O Lord,

'that will do,' and immediately carried on the composition as we have it in that most admirable chorus.

"That incomparable Air, Wise men, flattering, may deceive us (which was the last he composed, as Sion now his head shall raise, was his last chorus) was designed for Belshazzar, but that not being perform'd, he happily flung it into Judas Macchabæus. N.B. The plan of Judas Macchabæus was designed as a compliment to the Duke of Cumberland, upon his returning victorious from Scotland. I had introduced several incidents more apropos, but it was thought they would make it too long, and were therefore omitted. The Duke however made me a handsome present by the hands of Mr. Poyntz. The success of this Oratorio was very great. And I have often wished, that at first I had ask'd in jest, for the benefit of the 30th Night, instead of a 3d. I am sure he would have given it me: on which night the [re] was above 400*l.* in the House. He left me a legacy however of 200*l.*

"The next year he desired another, and I gave him Alexander Belus, which follows the history of the foregoing in the Macchabees. In the first part there is a very pleasing Air, accompanied with the harp, Hark, Hark, he strikes the Golden Lyre. In the 2d, two charming duets, O What pleasure past expressing, and Hail, wedded Love, mysterious Law. The 3d begins with an incomparable Air, in the affettuoso style, intermixed with the chorus Recitative that follows it. And as to the last Air, I cannot help telling you, that, when Mr. Handell first read it, he cried out D——n your Iambics. 'Dont put yourself in a passion, they are easily Trochees.' Trochees, what are Trochees? 'Why the very reverse of Iambics,' by leaving out a syllable in every line, as instead of 'Convey me to some peacefull shore,

'Lead me to some peacefull shore.'

'That is what I want.' 'I will step into the parlour, and alter them immediately.' I went down, and returned with them altered in about 3 minutes; when he would have them as they were, and had set them, most delightfully accompanied with only a quaver, and a rest of 3 quavers.

"The next I wrote was Theodora (in 1749), which Mr. Handell himself valued more than any Performance of the kind; and when I once ask'd him, whether he did not look upon the Grand Chorus in the Messiah as his Master Piece? 'No,' says he, 'I think the Chorus at the end of the 2d part in Theodora far beyond it, He saw the lovely youth, &c.

"The 2d night of Theodora was very thin indeed, tho' the Princess Amelia was there. I guessed it a losing night, so did not go to Mr. Handell as usual; but seeing him smile, I ventured, when, 'Will you be there next Friday night,' says he, 'and I will play it to you? I told him I had just seen Sir T. Hankey, and he desired me to tell you, that if you would have it again, he would engage for all the Boxes. He is a fool; the Jews will not come to it (as to Judas) because it is a Christian story; and the Ladies will not come, because it [is] a virtuous one.

"My own favourite is Jeptha, which I wrote in 1751, and in composing of which Mr. Handell fell blind. I had the pleasure to hear it finely perform'd at Salisbury under Mr. Harris; and in much greater perfection, as to the vocal part, at the Concert in Tottenham Court Road.

"The Triumph of Time and Truth—in 1757. The words were entirely adapted to the music of Il Trionfo del Tempo, composed at Rome in about 1707.

"To oblige Mr. Smith, Mr. Handell's successor, I wrote Nabal in 1764, and Gideon. The music of both are entirely taken from some old genuine pieces of Mr. Handell. In the latter is an inimitable Chorus—Gloria Patri, Gloria filio, which at first sight I despaired of setting with proper words; but at last struck out Glorious Patron, glorious Hero, &c., which did mighty well. . . ."

This letter of Dr. Morell throws interesting light on the services rendered to Handel in the matter of libretti. It certainly seems from it as if "Judas Maccabæus" was the Doctor's first attempt; and yet he has even been credited with having written the "Saul" book, of which Handel wrote the music in 1738. Dr. Chrysander, however, considers the author of the "Saul" book to have been Newburgh Hamilton, to whom Handel left £200 in his will for having "assisted me in adjusting words for some of my compositions." Dr. Morell mentions "Theodora" as his third attempt, yet neither Schoelcher nor Rockstro gives the name of the librettist. Both, however, refer to Handel's high opinion of the oratorio and to the comparison which the composer made between the chorus "He saw the lovely youth" and the "Grand Chorus" in "The Messiah." Schoelcher gives the "Biographica Dramatica" as his source. That work certainly gives this anecdote and also another mentioned below. The original source, however, is not named. The first is said to be given "from undoubted authority." The words in the "Biographica Drammatica" are practically the same as those in the above letter. From the reference to the "Triumph of Time and Truth," I certainly conclude that Dr. Morell was the author of the translation of Cardinal Panfili's poem. Rockstro, in his "Life of Handel" (p. 365), speaks of the "English version by an unknown author." The well-known story of the Jews and the ladies in connection with "Theodora" is mentioned by Schoelcher, and again his source is the "Biographica Dramatica." In the Handel Society edition Dr. Morell is said to have also written the libretto of "Solomon."

The references to Mr. Smith's oratorios are interesting. The way in which such works were made up by this worthy man, after the death of his master and friend, may be further illustrated from the preface to an oratorio entitled "Israel in Babylon," which preface is, indeed, attributed to Dr. Morell himself. The text is in a collection of libretti in the British Museum (7897, i. 24). Underneath is written in ink:—

"This preface bears internal evidence of having been written by Dr. Morell."

W. A.

The W. A. is undoubtedly William Ayrton. Here is a quotation from that preface:—

"The music (except some of the Recitatives) is selected from the works of the late Mr. Handel: To give the Public a Collection that is not common I have taken but two Movements from his Oratorios; one of which has been long disused; the other is an instrumental piece, which appears here in Duetto; the other parts of the Collection are from his Anthems, several of which were never printed, and are only to be found in the possession of the Curious; from his Operas, now little known; and some favourite Fuges and Airs in his Concertos, etc., which will appear in a new, and, I hope, an acceptable Light."

In the same collection there is an old Sacred Harmonic Society book of the words of "Samson" with following comment: "This compilation appears to have been made by Dr. Morell, the celebrated lexicographer, who supplied the words for most of Handel's oratorios."

FROM MY STUDY.

Wishing to emphasise the change from Kerry's barren rocks and dark, cold lakes to the freshness and beauty of Glengariff, Dean Hole (vide his delightful book, "A Little Tour in Ireland") makes a sudden sally, after his bright fashion, and remarks:

"You, my general readers, you, who, with that refinement of taste for which you are remarkable above all other readers, go to concerts at the Hanover Square Rooms in the season, and, out of it, to dingy County Halls, whenever the Italians sing—you, too, must help me with an analogy, and say—can you not recall how, amid all that severe and stately music, some plaintive ballad, quaint madrigal, or hearty glee refreshed your weary spirit and won the sole encore? It was so, at all events, when last I went to an operatic meeting in the Halls of Crystal; and Alboni sang; and Giuglini sang; and of Inis and Icos good store; and we beat time, and wasn't it delicious? but no song went home to our English hearts, roused us from our lethargic and drear gentility, and made us clap our English hands, save the song of 'The Hardy Norsemen.'"

Dean Hole—Under-Graduate Hole, as he was then—should, of course, have written, "The Hardy Norseman"; a fact which some former possessor of my copy draws attention to on the margin. But that is neither here nor there. I am not to be turned from the passage by a wrong vowel, and I contend that it is as true now as when London Society gathered, on Saturdays, under the palms of the Sydenham tropics, and operatic song-birds warbled, and poor Bowley, looking upon all, pronounced it very good. Taking "The Hardy Norseman" as typical of that which lies nearer to the heart of Mother Nature than, say, a music-drama by Wagner, do not we long to hear and applaud it? especially when London pavements are hot, and the sea calls to us from distant shores, and there passes before the mind's eye a vision of waving wheat. I am told of people who really are content all the long year with the artificialities of town, and even of some musical critics who complain that during autumnal weeks they have no work to do. Cherishing great respect for the memory of Dr. Johnson, I am not going to blame these my brethren. I only listen and wonder. Town-born, mayhap, are they, and cling to the breast of their mother. Doubtless they are happy in their way, as I in mine when, at an appointed season, instinct and opportunity hurry the children of fields and hedge-rows back to their native haunts. Many such take music with them, and sonatas of Beethoven and nocturnes of Chopin have come to me often through the open windows of rose-clad cottages, bespeaking the presence of some migrant from the distant city. But the country has a music of its own, and one form of it is that which Othello was willing to tolerate—"music that may not be heard." I know no finer music at certain seasons than that of silence. Sweetly and soothingly it falls upon the jaded sense of the town-weary man, and he drinks it in as a parched plain the long-delayed shower. His brother, perhaps, goes to Margate and becomes a follower of Uncle Bones, by whose inspiration he is removed far enough from lofty and much-vexed regions of art, and placed upon the humble level of "Kail-yard stories" and the vernacular. That is something. Were I a Margate visitor, I should probably be there or thereabout what time Uncle Bones lifts up his voice on the sands and sings:

Down in ole Wurginny,
Oh, Roley, Boley!
A gun dat massa gib me,
To go and shoot a coon.
Wid a hida ka dink, ah! ah!
Oh, Roley, Boley!
Wid a hida ka dink—who dere?
Good mornin', ladies all.

Thus warbling, Uncle Bones is as intelligible as some composers, but in any case let us touch earth now and then, we soaring ones.

I am fond of touching earth myself—as much of it as I cover when lying under a tree in some rural solitude. True, I hear nothing of the banjo, nor is the coon among the branches above. Other strains come to mind, and from the sweet influences of the place I draw the music desired by one of our English poets:

Come then, a song—a winding gentle song
To lead me into sleep. Let it be low
As zephyr telling secrets to his rose,
For I would hear the murmuring of my thoughts;
And more of voice than of that other music
That grows around the strings of quivering lutes,
But most of thought; for with my mind I listen.
And when the leaves of sound are shed upon it,
If there's no seed, remembrance grows not there.
So life, so death: a song and then a dream.

If the music lull me to sleep under the tree, it is good. When John Ella saw a M.P. deeply slumbering at one of his Musical Union concerts, he proclaimed, in his next analytical leaflet, that the fact illustrated the blessed influence of art upon the weary brain-worker. Sleep, then, weary brain-workers, lulled by the grasshopper's chirp and the hum of the wild bee.

How I wander on, forgetting that I am still in my study! But even here, the piping boy of Sidney's "Arcadia" pipes to me from the shelves, and he is own brother to the minstrels of the fields and woods.

Shortly after the death of Rowlandson, the caricaturist, Ackerman brought out an annual entitled "The Humourist, a Companion for the Christmas Fireside," for which W. H. Harrison provided letterpress in the form of short poems, tales, and sketches. The book contained fifty engravings by Rowlandson and a number of vignettes; the illustrations being the real stuff and Harrison's work the padding. Harrison, in point of fact, had to write up to the wood blocks in his publisher's possession—a duty not entirely unknown at the present time. Among the blocks in question was one representing a blind piper led by a little girl, who is receiving alms at a cottage door. Another shows a clergyman, in surplice and hood, beating time while a group of young men and women sing with wide-open mouths. Harrison had to work in some verses for which these engravings would serve, and the result was a piece called "The Musical Prodigy." There is the very smallest possible connection between the poetry and the pictures, but I am not concerned with that so much as with the fact that the story of the "Prodigy" might have been written at the present day and with reference to recent specimens of the wonder-child. After two introductory stanzas, the poet comes to business:

But, of modern musicians of note,
There was one who gained riches and glory
So quickly that, Sir, I'll devote
A stanza or two to his story.

We are then told of this hero's infantine achievements in the direction of the divine art:

His Pandeans he made, flat and sharp,
With the pipes of the housekeeper's keys,
And, by way of Æolian harp,
Hung the gridiron up in the trees.

His fond mother thought him good enough for the metropolis:

So her pet on her knee, by the stage,
With his hair interestingly curl'd,
Reached London, which is, I'll engage,
The best prodigy mart in the world.

She laid out, of course, the first week,
A few guineas in puffs paragraphic,
Describing his touch magnifique,
And his voice absolutely seraphic.
. . . . . .

In the course of a fortnight or so,
All London was perfectly wild,
And by dozens the sight-hunters go
To look at the "Wonderful Child."

And patrons in all ranks and stations,
On our hero looked smilingly down,
And he got, every night, invitations
From the first lion-feeders in town.
. . . . . .

From this rout to that he was lugg'd,
With sweetmeats and sugarplums fed,
By young and old duchesses hugged,
While royalty patted his head.

For some time, among nobles and kings,
Our musician made no little racket,
Till, at last, in the nature of things,
He outgrew both his fame and his jacket.

So his business got slack, not, forsooth,
That he was one whit the less clever,
But because they couldn't keep the poor youth
In the same pair of breeches for ever.
. . . . . .

So he made the best use of his knowledge,
And, by means of an adequate fee,
Imported, from some foreign college,
A doctor of music degree.

Then he set up as professor of singing, married a rich pupil—and the lady, 'tis said,

Forgetting duet and cantata,
Sings "Lullaby, baby," instead.

At present there appears to be a "slump" in prodigies, the result, perhaps, of over-production, not of any change in the English nature from what it was when Shakespeare wrote "The Tempest."

I do not boast of never having given attention to the literature of the Variety Stage, now that I have read the preface to Messrs. Charles

Douglas Stuart and A. J. Park's "History of the Music Halls from the earliest period to the present time." Here is a passage from the foreword in question: "As a factor in the domestic life of the masses, its influence (that of the Variety Stage) can hardly be over-estimated; while the hold which it retains to-day on the suffrage of the people is as remarkable as it is conspicuous. Indeed, few other forms of public entertainment command so large a share of popular support as that presented by the modern Music Hall, which constitutes in itself the most formidable rival in the patronage of the populace which the legitimate stage has ever possessed. Within recent years its prominence has become still more evident. All that wealth, art, and taste could yield have been enlisted in its service. Capital, representing an aggregate of many hundreds of thousands, has been invested in its ventures and recouped by phenomenal returns; veritable Temples of Variety, designed by the leading artists of the day, and upholstered, appointed, and embellished in a style rivalling in magnificence and display the palace of an Eastern potentate, have sprung up in all the principal cities of the kingdom, and entrepreneurs of European celebrity have ransacked the globe in their insatiable thirst for novelties of every description." I do not dispute either the truth of these statements or the importance of the subject to observers of social changes, but it is not my purpose to review Messrs. Stuart and Park's book farther than the opening chapters, which are devoted to the precursors of the modern music hall. These, according to our authors, were of three kinds. First, the Song and Supper Rooms, of which one, Evans's, survived till a recent time. Second, the Saloons, such as the once famous Grecian in the City Road; and, third, the Variety Concert-rooms, which were a development of the casual harmonic meetings promoted by publicans. The book before me gives an interesting account of these primitive institutions; nevertheless I lay it down, and take up "The Pickwick Songster," a work edited by "Sam Weller," and issued in penny numbers, eleven of which have survived for the benefit of my collection. Incidentally, this song-book is a witness to the wonderful popularity of Dickens's most famous story. The yellow front cover shows a classic peristyle, supported on one side by "Samivel" in the act of cleaning a boot; on the other by Mr. Pickwick himself, in Greek costume and strumming lyre-wise upon a gridiron. Each number is illustrated in the manner of the Cruickshanks ("Universal Songster," "London Singers' Magazine," &c.); but the special feature of the publication, or rather of certain of its numbers, is an excursion into the regions of criticism. The editor, looking round upon the "London Concerts" (by which he means the entertainments given in saloons and public houses), saw much to condemn. He espied "ignorant pretenders" and "scamps of the profession," and he made up his mind to go for them, remarking, in No. 4, "next week we shall commence our task with great spirit." Never was promise more fully redeemed, especially when dealing with a saloon called the Mogul in Drury Lane. For the purpose of this notice, "Sam Weller" borrowed the style of the rival editors at Eatanswill, and gave the world a peculiarly forcible description of a Drury Lane song-temple sixty years ago:

"The Mogul is situated in the filthiest and most blackguard part of Drury Lane, and is opened every evening in the week for a vocal display, the charge for admittance being 2d., which same 2d. is consigned to the pocket of the money-scraping, professional-grinding Cook, who is the presiding genius of the establishment. The room is rather a large one, and partakes of all the beauties and chaste architecture of a cow-house and a ranter's chapel. At one end of the room is a stage, on which are the instruments of torture—the terrific organ and the discordant pianoforte. The other portion of the place is divided into rows of boxes, of the real tap-room order, and, as a stronger recommendation to it, it stands on the site of that elegant apartment where, years past, the costermongers and their ladies nightly assembled to enjoy the luxuries of a general fight, seasoned by a hop."

Some of the performers are shown to us, among them "a most extraordinary-looking being, who wears a very short Scotch kilt, dirty fleshings, a battered bonnet, and a cockatoo's feather. This is Mr. May, whom we candidly confess we at first mistook for Grimston's wooden Scotchman, which we had missed from the door of that celebrated snuff merchant; but Mr. May kindly undeceived us by opening his lips, and we were certain it could be nobody else but Mr. May, no other person being capable of making a noise so awful." High talent could hardly be expected on "old Cook's" terms, which are thus scheduled: "For a first-rate sentimental singer per night—One shilling, one pint of beer, and a pipe of tobacco. For a comic singer per night—Sixpence, no pipe, and a smell of the swipes. For a lady—Fifteenpence, and find her own gin and bread and cheese. Casual professional visitors—One pint of beer among six."

Further, it is said, as to Mr. Cook: "Unfortunately for old Cook of the above vocal dust-hole, whom we slightly roasted in our first article, we heard, a week or more ago, of his having in his utter despair at the overwhelming chastisement of our rod, given ten shillings for the insertion of an article to cut us up to mince-meat in a dirty and obscure work called the 'Penny Town,' whose beastly proprietor will unquestionably, ere many weeks are over, be dancing on the treadmill and fattening on skilly in the House of Correction." This pace was much too hot to last, and I am not surprised when, a few numbers later, the Editor says that in compliance with several requests, Sam Weller's Review will appear occasionally only. In point of fact, it did not appear at all thereafter.

From the Mogul to the music hall is a change indeed! X.

NEW LIGHTS UPON OLD TUNES.

No. VIII.

"The Campbells are coming."

Many writers on the subject of British Folk-music have been, and still are, I fancy, much too apt to assign a definite birthplace to the particular airs they write about. If a writer is forming a collection of Scottish, Irish, Welsh, or English tunes, he appears to make it a point of honour to include in his survey such airs as lie upon the debatable line of origin; and frequently, without setting forth all that is known of the tune, will appropriate it to the country whose folk-music he is editing. One class of writers who have neither sympathy with nor understanding of Scottish music will allow nothing to have birth North of the Tweed save a few "Sniggering pibrochs and jiggetty reels"; while a certain Northern part of England sticks fast to a group of folk-tunes claimed both by the Scotch and the Irish, all being quite oblivious of the fact that most of the airs see the light first in old London dance books, and for that reason some might as easily claim them for the South country.

Again, in regard to Irish airs, the accidental circumstance that Irish harpers have in some cases fitted existing tunes with variations which, having come down traditionally, have been inserted in Irish collections, has sufficed to class these as belonging purely to Ireland. Carolan's "Bumpers, Squire Jones," is an instance in point, for old John Playford published the tune at an early date in his Dancing Master as the "Rummer," and most probably it is the composition of a London dancing master.

Again, the old Irish harper Lyons, having composed variations to "A lovely lass to a Friar came," and this having been published by Bunting, has caused the whole tune to be considered Irish, while Moore's adoption of "The Girl I left behind me" has produced the same result. A search through Welsh collections will reveal several airs having equal English claims.

It is unfortunate that this mistaken patriotism or partiality has led collectors and editors of national music astray, for a good melody is surely cosmopolitan, and it matters little from what source it has sprung or how it has grown, so long as we have it to enjoy.

But besides this partiality, it is to be deplored that many writers will not take the trouble to investigate the matters they write about, but are content to copy and re-copy from the standard text-books, instead of adding to or correcting by their own individual research. In respect to British national music, owing to the avidity with which old musical works are bought up and stored in our public and private libraries, facilities exist to-day which were absent forty or fifty years ago, when such hard-working pioneers as Chappell, Rimbault, Bunting, Petrie, and others worked.

There can surely be no more difficult task for a musical antiquary than the accurate settlement of the place of origin of folk-tunes; as, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, they are the production of "some mute inglorious" individual whose name has probably never been heard out of his native parish. Many of our sweetest airs have had their birth at the plough-tail or in the milking byre, or perhaps they first trembled into life on the strings of a rustic fiddle.

These first germs have travelled afield, carried by journeymen, tinkers, or general wanderers who may have heard the tune or the ditty roared out in chorus at the fireside of a village ale-house, again to be repeated by them at other rustic meeting-places. The pedlars, too, were but half accomplished if they could not carry the songs as well as the gossip of a country-side. Pedlars, from almost the very birth of printing (for the press gave forth ballads and broadsides soon after) down to our own day, had always a stock of flimsy ballad-sheets in the corner of their boxes, adapted to the varying tastes of their clients.

Autolycus himself would have had but scant patronage if he could not have sung the tune for that ballad of the "strange fish" or borne a part in the vocalisation of "Two Maids wooing a man."*

Taking thus into consideration how old tunes travelled almost (if not entirely) by ear, it is not wonderful that so many versions of the same air are found in different parts of the country, each having such antiquity of popularity in a district as to render its claim for origin there almost a certainty. Many pages have been printed and much laborious argument set forth in the attempt to prove the antiquity or birthplace of an air by the presence or absence in it of a particular interval. The pentatonic scale theory has been broached and applied to both Irish and Scotch folk-music, and every tune which did not fit this has been condemned as either not old or, if age is indisputable, having suffered modern alteration. The dogma of the pentatonic scale having for its groundwork the imperfection of the musical instruments in Ireland and Scotland, is futile when we recollect that the old Irish harp of thirty strings had been in existence from the dawn of civilization, and was either (as some people contend) native to Scotland or constantly to be seen and heard by the frequent passage of Irish harpers. In Scottish music the omission of the fourth and seventh is undoubtedly a characteristic feature of one class of airs, and Bunting, in the case of Irish music, dismisses the imperfect scale argument, but advances the theory that the presence of the emphatic major sixth is the test for the music of his country. Unfortunately, however, for all these propositions they are by no means conclusive; there are purely Scotch melodies having the fourth and seventh intervals, and other melodies which have the "emphatic major sixth" are as certainly not Irish. I think it will be found practically impossible to definitely settle the origin of an air by any rules such as these.

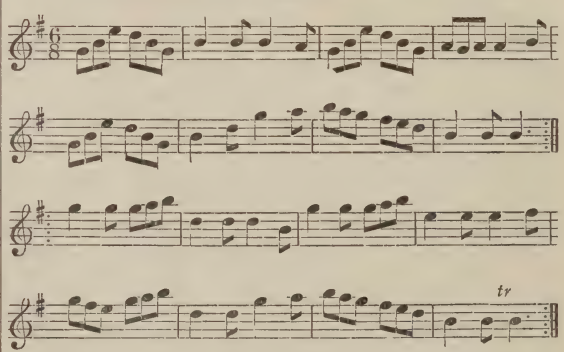
As the melodies were not composed by method, no hard and fast test can be applied. An air is English, Irish, or Scotch by its general structure, and its nationality is to be pronounced in the same manner as an expert would judge the painter of a picture—by the handling, the subject, or the colour; and as in this case the judgment might, after all, be wrong!

An air which has travelled by ear from one district to another has most certainly the character of the music of the district it has travelled into impressed upon it; for the singer or the player either consciously or unconsciously makes this change in it, and it is astonishing what can be done with a tune without altering a note.

Some time ago it was reported that the natives of the West Coast of Africa were dancing and singing "Tar-ra-ra-boom-de-ay" with the same mad delight that it inspired in a more intellectual race. I strongly suspect that if the tune were now noted down from a native singer, we should find a certain West African flavour imparted to it which the composer never dreamt of.

This is rather a long prelude to the introduction of an early example of an air which, while claimed as purely Scottish, is found at prior dates in English books and under an English name, attention to which is, I believe, now for the first time directed. I have spoken above of the futility of attempting to settle in a hard and fast manner the nationality of tunes, and having given my reasons against hasty judgments in such cases, I therefore by no means claim an English origin. It must be remembered there were not the facilities for the publication of music in Scotland as in England, and till at least 1780 Scotland was very backward in this respect.



The air known as "The Campbells are coming," it is said, was the ancient gathering tune of the clan Campbell, and in the index to Johnson's Museum, Vol. III., 1790, it is stated that the tune was composed on the imprisonment of Mary Queen of Scots in Loch Leven, 1567.

William Stenhouse, the annotator of the Museum, gives the more likely suggestion that it was written about the time of the Highland rising in 1715. The first appearance of the tune in print under the title "The Campbells are coming," is in Oswald's Caledonian Pocket Companion, Book III., which was probably published about 1750-2, though the dates of the several books of this very important work have hitherto baffled my enquiries. Under the Campbell title, Bremner gives it in No. 11 of his "Reels," circa 1760, and later in the century it became frequent in Scottish publications. When Miss Kitty Stephens and the Waverley Novels had their day it became universal.

It is curious to find it under another title thus:—

From "Jno. Johnson's 200 Country Dances," Vol. IV., 1748.

This tune, under the name "Hob or Nob," is found in the following old country dance books: "Walsh's Caledonian* Country Dances," Book I., circa 1740: "Jno. Johnson's 200 Country Dances," Vol. IV., 1748; "David Rutherford's 24 Dances" for 1750; and "Peter Thompson's 200 Country Dances," circa 1758.

The air has been so long associated as a bagpipe tune for military marching that it is difficult to conceive it as an eighteenth century country dance.

The famous incident of Jessie MacGregor hearing it at Lucknow when almost all hope was gone has, like all romances, been severely attacked; it is, however, easy of belief.

PASTIMES FOR MUSICIANS.

The subject of musicians' pastimes can obviously be treated in several ways, and we have no doubt that the most popular method of handling it would be to develop the brief information given under the heading "Recreations" in the new edition of "Who's who," on the lines of the personal paragraphs in the penny weekly papers. As thus: "Mdlle. Corisande Stockdolloger, the beautiful blue-eyed pianist from Tipperusalem (Ga.), is passionately fond of the catapult, and has been known to floor a bobolink at a hundred yards." Or again: "M. Vladimir Tchitchikoff, the great Siberian basso, keeps himself in training for the arduous rôle of Bulbo, in the 'Blind Boxer of Batoum,' by punching the ball for three hours daily." Or, once more: "Signor Salamandro Squarcione, by way of getting local colour for his next one-act opera, has applied for and obtained the post of electrocutionist to the State of Arkansas." This method, as we have already admitted, has divided attractions. There is something indescribably soothing to the ordinary person in being thus, as it were, led behind the scenes and confronted with the spectacle of Apollo with his bow unbent, of genius at play. One can cheerfully dispense with a knowledge of Verdi's music, so long as one knows, on the authority of Great Snips, that he is an adept at spillikins. It matters little whether one has heard Signor Tam-Tamagnifico or not provided one has the assurance of the Keyhole that he measures nineteen inches round the biceps and always practises with dumb-bells before entering his matutinal tub. But tempting as this field of inquiry unquestionably is, we must reluctantly leave it to writers better equipped than ourselves for the collection of these thrilling personalia, and confine ourselves to a general discussion of the pastimes best suited to the members of the various branches of the musical profession.

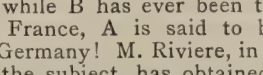
That it is desirable for musicians to alternate the labours of their calling with indulgence in recreative pastimes, is a proposition which commands universal assent. To say nothing of the venerable maxim relative, as the lions of Peterborough Court might phrase it, to the intellectual hebetude engendered by a too assiduous devotion to study, we live in so athletic an age that no self-respecting individual can venture to assert his insensibility to the fascinations of out-door recreation. Apart from which it is notorious that one large and important class of musicians—we refer to the tribe of vocalists—are inconveniently prone to the accumulation of adipose tissue. On both of these grounds exercise is to be commended, and exercise is seldom so agreeable as when it involves the participation in a game or pastime. Descending from generalities to particulars, we are naturally confronted at the outset by the claims of the national game par excellence, cricket. And, on the face of it, there is a peculiar affinity between the disciples of St. Cecilia and the votaries of the great summer game, seeing that both are intimately concerned with "scores." Further investigation, however, proves this connection to be somewhat misleading. Cricket is all very well for the composers or compilers of scores, but it is eminently unsuitable for the interpreters thereof. Any one who has examined the hands of a great professional or amateur wicket-keeper will speedily come to the conclusion that this post is not fitted for a Sarasate or a Paderewski, or, in fine, for any aspirant to instrumental virtuosity. And the same remarks, with some modification, apply to batting, fielding, and even umpiring. There is no reason why singers should not play cricket in moderation, but as for instrumentalists, the only function in connection with the game which they can fill with impunity is that of scorer. Even umpires are liable to be "cut over" by a hard return or a hit to square leg. Rugby football, again, is, we fear, out of the question, though the Association game ought to be useful in developing the agility of organists in the department of pedal playing, while lawn tennis ought to afford ample opportunities for distinction to the same class of musicians, owing to their experience in taking all manner of "services." But the two games which above all others seem to lend themselves most happily to the requirements and limitations of musicians are golf and croquet. On the merits and beauties and infinite variety of the "Royal and Ancient Game" it is unnecessary to expatiate at this time of day. From the point of view of the musician, however, it has the advantage that it does not involve any violent strain, and is practically free from the element of danger. Professor Karl Pearson, the eminent mathematician and philosopher, has recently discussed the chances of death in an elaborate essay, and no doubt would be prepared to supply a formula suited to the requirements of the timorous aspirant to golfing honours. We feel sure that it would be a highly reassuring formula. People have been killed at golf, but, if we mistake not, they have been more often spectators than participants in the game. For the rest, the use of the clubs is not likely to interfere with the suppleness of hand so essential to the executant; while the vicissitudes of the game afford splendid scope for the indulgence by vocalists in impassioned declamation. We can imagine no better preparation for the ideal rendering of a part which calls for a display of fury, despair, or indignation than a few minutes spent in ineffectual efforts to lift the ball out of a bunker. Finally, there remains croquet, which, whatever may be its intrinsic merits as a pastime, is at all points irreproachable as a recreation for musicians of all branches and ages. The infant prodigy, the prima donna, and the double-bassoonist can all take part in this blameless and innocuous pastime, with the knowledge that the utmost risk which is run is that of hitting your partner or your opponent instead of the ball. And there are moments when the latter calamity is positively calculated to inspire satisfaction rather than sorrow in the striker.

The dinner, which might be called a banquet, given by Mr. George M. Smith, the well-known publisher, to the editor of and the contributors to the "Dictionary of National Biography," on the 8th ult., was a very brilliant function. Within the walls of the Whitehall Rooms, Hôtel Métropole, were gathered together a distinguished company, which included the Bishops of London and Oxford, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Lecky, and many other eminent workers in the paths of historical and biographical literature. Mr. Leslie Stephen, the first editor, referred to the fact that the "Dictionary"—which Lord Rosebery designates "the monumental literary work of Her Majesty's reign"—had inaugurated an improved standard of research and accuracy in biographical study. Nowhere is this more needed than in musical books of reference, where writers, by shirking original research, have too often been content merely to copy from their predecessors, inaccuracies included. The Master of the Temple (Canon Ainger) made the hit of the evening when he epitomised the rule laid down for the guidance of contributors, by saying, "No flowers, by request." The musical contributors to the "Dictionary" were represented on this interesting occasion by Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, Mr. Henry Davey, and Mr. F. G. Edwards.



A similar function, though of a more private nature, should also be recorded by reason of its interesting and unique nature. Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Littleton entertained at dinner, on the 16th ult., at 19, Devonshire Place, W., the Cathedral organists, "to meet Sir Frederick Bridge, organist of Westminster Abbey, and Sir George Martin, organist of St. Paul's Cathedral," who were accompanied by Lady Bridge and Lady Martin. The other Cathedral organists present were Dr. G. B. Arnold (Winchester), Dr. F. Bates (Norwich), Mr. G. G. Beale (Llandaff), Dr. G. J. Bennett (Lincoln), Mr. A. H. Brewer (Gloucester), Mr. T. H. Collinson (St. Mary's, Edinburgh), Mr. J. E. Jeffries (Newcastle), Dr. Haydn Keeton (Peterborough), Mr. R. W. Liddle (Southwell), Mr. C. G. Marchant (St. Patrick's, Dublin), Mr. H. C. Morris (St. David's), Mr. T. Tertius Noble (Ely), Dr. F. J. Read (Chichester), Mr. George Riseley (Bristol), Mr. G. R. Sinclair (Hereford), Mr. C. F. South (Salisbury), and Mr. T. Westlake-Morgan (Bangor).

The other guests were Sir John Stainer, Professor of Music at the University of Oxford and late organist of St. Paul's Cathedral; Dr. E. J. Hopkins, organist of the Temple Church and "the father of English organists"; Dr. E. H. Turpin, hon. secretary of the Royal College of Organists; Dr. C. Harford Lloyd, Precentor of Eton and formerly organist of Gloucester and Oxford Cathedrals; Dr. Creser, organist of the Chapel Royal, St. James's; Mr. Battison Haynes, organist of the Chapel Royal, Savoy; Mr. F. G. Edwards (Editor of The Musical Times), Mr. Augustus Littleton, and the two eldest sons of Mr. Alfred Littleton. The host, in welcoming his guests, who came from such distant places as Dublin and Edinburgh, mentioned that the inception of that pleasant gathering of Cathedral organists, the first of its kind, was due to "one of our leading Cathedral organists." Some capital and highly amusing speeches were given by Sir George Martin, Sir Frederick Bridge, Sir John Stainer, Dr. E. J. Hopkins (now in his eightieth year), Mr. George Riseley (representing the provincial organists), and Mr. C. G. Marchant, of Dublin. Several gentlemen wrote expressing extreme regret at their unavoidable absence.

The utterances of Sir John Stainer always command respect and attention. The title of his last terminal lecture in the Sheldonian Theatre, Oxford, "Music as a branch of education," is a subject naturally congenial to the genial Professor, and one on which he is fully qualified to discourse. Speaking of the teaching of music in schools of all classes, Sir John defended instruction in the art of sight reading on the ground that it did not hinder children from singing school-songs by ear, but that it had the advantage of enabling the more gifted children to show their talents so that they might be improved. The Professor then referred with gratification to the improved attitude of both masters and pupils towards music in secondary and public schools, and showed from experience how useful some training in the art was to all. After treating of the position held by music in the University, and sketching out an "ideal Oxford School of Music," Sir John Stainer advised, where it was possible, that when a boy left school he should devote two years to the study of music, either at home or abroad, before coming up to Oxford. The Arts course, as well as a Musical Degree, was the ideal education to aim at. Lastly, the Professor did not consider a Continental musical education to be essential, as some appear to think necessary. The lecture, of which the above is the briefest summary, should be printed, as it was full of many suggestive thoughts admirably expressed.

The Royal Academy of Music is well represented at the Victorian Era Exhibition by some interesting exhibits. There are portraits of the eleventh Earl of Westmoreland, who, as Lord Burghersh, practically founded the Academy, and of all the principals—viz., Dr. Crotch, Cipriani Potter, Charles Lucas, Sir William Sterndale Bennett, Sir George Macfarren, and Sir Alexander Mackenzie. Specimens of the productive powers of these six "chief musicians" at Tenterden Street are shown in autograph scores of "The Lord is King," by Crotch; a Symphony in G minor, by Potter; three symphonies, by Lucas; the well-known Caprice in E for pianoforte and orchestra (Op. 22), by Bennett; the cantata "May Day," by Macfarren; and the "Rose of Sharon," by the present holder of the office. Mr. Walter Macfarren, the doyen professor at the Academy, to whom we are indebted for calling our attention to this excellent collection, lends an oil portrait of his eminent brother, Sir George Macfarren, and a replica, painted by the great artist himself, of the well-known picture of Mendelssohn, by Magnus, of Berlin. The latter was presented to Sterndale Bennett by Mendelssohn's family, and after Bennett's death, in 1875, it passed into Mr. Macfarren's possession. The Exhibition is well worth a visit.

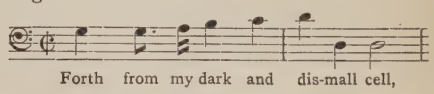
"Is it A or B?" That is the semiquaver question which M. Jules Riviere, the well-known chef d'orchestre, asks in regard to the last note in the thirty-second bar of the famous Ranz des Vaches in Rossini's "William Tell" overture. The passage stands thus in the autograph score, dating from before 1829:—

The last note stands as B; but, strangely enough, it has always been, and still is, printed A. Moreover, it appears that while B has ever been the traditional rendering in France, A is said to be adopted in England and Germany! M. Riviere, in an exhaustive pamphlet on the subject, has obtained the opinions of several eminent French conductors—including

MM. Lamoureux and Colonne—as well as oboeists and others, who all unhesitatingly affirm that B, and not A, is the right note. But why such a misprint—if it is a misprint—has been suffered to remain in the printed copies all these years is a mystery.

M. Colonne records that, in 1861, Rossini, who was then nearly seventy years of age, attended the rehearsal of a ballet at the Paris Opera House, when, in honour of the Maëstro, his "William Tell" overture was played. He made no remark about the aforesaid B in the Ranz des Vaches; but, as showing that he kept his aged ears open, he wished the upper note of the violoncello trill in bar thirty-nine of the overture to be played G natural, not G sharp, thus:—

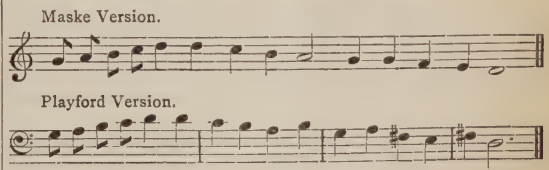
It is very interesting to find that so modern a master as Rossini upheld the traditions characteristic of Bach's time, of treating ornaments diatonically. Much "false doctrine" has been disseminated upon an arbitrary performance of embellishments, regardless of their natural environment.



Mr. J. S. Shedlock's valuable book "The Pianoforte Sonata" has appeared in a German translation with the title "Die Klavier-Sonate" (Carl Habel, Berlin). In a brief preface the author refers to his omission, in the original English version, of Mendelssohn, to which Professor Prout and other reviewers called attention. Mr. Shedlock promises in a second edition of his book to make mention of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Sonata in E (Op. 6). Fräulein Olga Stieglitz, in addition to providing an excellent translation, has, in this German edition, added various notes and enlarged the index of a very interesting contribution to musical literature.

Who wrote the words and who wrote the music of the song known as "Mad Tom," or "Tom of Bedlam"? The words were for many years attributed to Tom d'Urfey. Isaac Walton, however, in his "Compleat Angler," speaks of "Mr. William Basse, one that has made the choice songs of 'The Hunter in his career' and of 'Tom of Bedlam,' and many others of note." Bas, or Basse, died in or about 1653, the year in which D'Urfey was born. The earliest book we have been able to find containing the poem is one entitled "Le Prince d'Amour | or the | Prince of Love | with a | Collection | of several Ingenious | Poems | & | Songs | By the Wits of the Age." | This was published in 1660. If this version be compared with the one generally sung, curious differences, apart from orthography, will be found. The line, for instance, in the modern version, "Through the world I wander night and day," reads in the old, "Through the woods," &c; and the modern "Pentateuch of Tenses" appears to have been evolved from "Pentarchy of tences."

The music at a very early date was attributed to Henry Purcell. The melody only is said to have been included in a collection of Purcell's works, published by Walsh a few years after the composer's death; and in Ritson's "Select Collection of English Songs," published in 1783, the song is given as "Set by mr Purcell." The supposed earliest copy of "Mad Tom of Bedlam" is to be found in "Choice Songs and Ayres for One Voice, to sing to a Theorbo-Lute, or Bass-Viol," sold by John Playford, near the Temple Church, 1673. These songs are stated on the title-page to have been "composed by several Gentlemen of His Majesties Musick." Here it is entitled merely "Mad Tom. For a Bass alone." It ends with the section in 3-4 time, of which the concluding words are—



Bid Charles make ready his wain,
To bring me my senses again.

The song commences thus:—

There is no further index to the composers of the various songs in this volume beyond the "several Gentlemen" of the title-page. Hawkins, by the way, attributes the music of "Mad Tom" to Henry Lawes.

Chappell, in his "Popular Music of the Olden Time" (Vol. I., p. 328), states that the "earliest printed copy hitherto discovered of the music of this celebrated song" is to be found in the first edition of "The English Dancing-Master" (1650-51), under the title "Gray's-Inne-Maske" (the first word, however, ought to be spelt thus: Graies). Either the Playford version was evolved from this, or both versions were evolved from some still earlier one. This "Graies-Inne-Maske" tune differs at times from the Playford in the notes; further, the one is written in an old mode, the latter practically in a modern key. Then the words of the poem as found in the Playford version will not fit the "Maske" tune as it stands written. So that it has been altered to fit the words. Is it not just possible this might have been done by young Purcell? Certain portions have been repeated, evidently for the sake of the words. And here is a phrase to show how the "Maske" tune has been altered—

About the beginning of the last century an addition was made to "Mad Tom," and apparently by an organist named George Hayden, the composer of "As I saw fair Chlora." There are various versions of this "Hayden" setting. In an old volume of songs by Henry and Daniel Purcell, Eccles, Carey, &c. (the copy in the British Museum was presented by George Noble and Elizabeth Morgan in 1731), there is a "Mad Tom set by Mr. Hayden." In another collection of English Ballads, published in 1790, there is a "New Mad Tom, set by Mr. Hayden." A few pages before is to be found a song entitled "Old Mad Tom," but it bears no name. In an old Dublin edition of "Mad Tom" it is described as "An admir'd Song by the celebrated Purcell, lately revis'd." This consists of the old song as in the Playford volume, continued by the "Hayden" song in shortened form.

Chappell, in his "Popular Music of the Olden Time," speaks of yet another version, "having a 9-4 movement at the close." To describe in detail the various "Hayden" versions would be useless. But the fact is worth noting that the "Mad Tom," published in modern times under the name of Purcell, has very little, if anything, of Purcell's in it. The song was even sung by Mr. David Bispham, January 14, 1895, at a Monday Popular Concert, and marked with Purcell's name! "Mad Tom," it should be stated, is not in "Orpheus Britannicus," published by Purcell's widow shortly after the composer's death.

The Wagner Museum has at length been opened at Eisenach, on June 20, and the unique collection will now be accessible to students of the life and works of the Bayreuth master, and to the public generally. The collection, it will be remembered, owes its existence to the intelligent zeal and energy of Herr Nicolaus Oesterlein, a Viennese amateur, who has compiled a most interesting and exhaustive catalogue of its contents, and by whom it was opened to the public some ten years ago in the Austrian capital. But the undertaking was of too gigantic a nature to be long carried on by a single individual, however energetic, and efforts made on the part of the collector to hand over the museum to some German municipality for a reasonable sum having proved fruitless, there was a probability of its contents, gathered together with such painstaking care, being again dispersed and hidden away in the portfolios of the omnivorous private collector. It is owing to the munificent liberality of Commerzienrath L. Leichner, of Berlin, Dr. Obrist, the Stuttgart conductor, and a few others, that this most regrettable eventuality has been avoided, and the collection, carefully and conveniently arranged, is now safely housed at the historical Villa Reuter, near Eisenach, which has been considerably enlarged for the purpose and which is the property of the municipality of the town. An interesting brochure, setting forth in detail the history of the Institution, has been published by Professor Kürschner, the honorary custodian.

Dieppe was the scene, on the 18th ult., of quite a series of public demonstrations in honour of M. Saint-Saëns, who is a frequent and highly popular visitor to the famous holiday resort. A lunch was given at the grand saloon of the Hôtel de Ville, when M. Thaulow, the Norwegian painter, proposed the health of the honoured guest, followed by an official visit to the new museum, containing some rare and interesting gifts presented by the composer; after which the assembled company proceeded to the Place de la Comédie, which was there and then solemnly re-named "Place Camille Saint-Saëns," a ceremony which the composer, who is not devoid of a sense of humour, doubtless keenly enjoyed. The proceedings terminated with a concert in the evening at the Casino, at which an enthusiastic audience of some fifteen hundred persons offered a series of ovations to the distinguished musician.

A well-founded protest is offered by a writer in The Times, of the 21st ult., against the conspicuous neglect of British music shown by the military authorities at the recent commemoration festivities. The reductio ad absurdum of this method was reached at the review of Colonial troops, at Buckingham Palace, when the programme was exclusively composed of French and German music, and might have served as an appropriate selection for a military review in Paris or Berlin. The writer is far from contending that nothing but British music should be performed on such occasions: he merely submits that at great national celebrations it is not unreasonable to expect that the public should be reminded that British tunes do exist. It is probably only a survival of the old view of music as an imported and exotic luxury that renders such solecisms possible. Certainly in no other part of the civilised world could such an anomaly be perpetrated without provoking the most violent explosion of patriotic sentiment.

Following upon the preliminary announcement, made in our last issue, of Dr. E. J. Hopkins's forthcoming "Hand-Book on the Organ," we are enabled to state that a more detailed prospectus of the plan and scope of the new book has now been prepared, copies of which may be obtained on application to the publishers, Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.

The mortal remains of Johannes Brahms were, on June 12, conveyed to their definite resting-place in the Central Cemetery, Vienna. The ceremony was witnessed, amongst others, by Secretary von Koch, Herren Faber, Mandiczeosky, Miller von Aichholz, and R. von Perger, of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. It has been decided in the Hamburg Law Courts that the Viennese authorities are alone competent to deal with the property left by Brahms. It is therefore probable that, in accordance with the informal will of the master, his valuable collection of manuscripts, as well as a legacy in money, will be handed over to the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

The Pope is said to have pronounced against the violin in church, and that instrument is now, I suppose, placed on the Index, along with the voices of women. His Holiness is a well-meaning gentleman, and does nothing from mere whim, we may be sure; but it passes me to conceive what there is of improper sensuousness in the tones of a fiddle. However, the Pope judges according to his lights, and the Catholic world will doubtless obey.

The musical composer seems to take it as a mere matter of course that his honours will be post mortem. Some days ago I asked Professor Stanford when we were likely to hear again his fine Elegiac Ode. "After I am dead," was the answer. So Mr. Saint-Saëns, talked to about his "glory," exclaimed, "Don't bother about my glory; let us drink to music. Glory cannot come without death."

Success to the Feis Ceoil, and may it wake the harp of Tara to pure and primitive song. Irishmen who are worth their salt will strain every nerve to that end. Englishman, as I am, I cannot read without emotion Thomas Furlong's lines on the spirit of Irish song:

Loved land of the Bards and Saints! to me
There's nought so dear as thy minstrelsy;
Bright is Nature in every dress,
Rich in unborrow'd loveliness;
Winning is every shape she wears,
Winning she is in thine own sweet airs;
What to the spirit more cheering can be
Than the lay whose lingering notes recall
The thoughts of the holy, the fair, the free,
Beloved in life, or deplored in their fall?
Fling, fling the forms of art aside;
Dull is the ear that these forms enthral;
Let the simple songs of our sires be tried,
They go to the heart, and the heart is all.
Give me the full responsive sigh,
The glowing cheek and the moistened eye;
Let these the minstrel's might attest,
And the vain and the idle may share the rest.

Somewhat àpropos to the foregoing is a passage in R. L. Stevenson's "Across the Plains." He describes a journey from New York to San Francisco in an emigrant train: "It was a troubled, uncomfortable evening in the cars. There was thunder in the air, which helped to keep us restless. A man played many airs upon the cornet, and none of them were much attended to until he came to 'Home, sweet home.' It was truly strange to note how the talk ceased at that, and the faces began to lengthen. I have no idea whether, musically, this air is to be considered good or bad; but it belongs to that class of art which may be best described as a brutal assault upon the feelings. Pathos must be relieved by dignity of treatment. If you wallow naked in the pathetic, like the author of 'Home, sweet home,' you make your hearers weep in an unmanly fashion, and even while yet they are moved, they despise themselves and hate the occasion of their weakness. It did not come to tears that night, for the experiment was interrupted. An elderly, hard-looking man, with a goatee beard, and about as much appearance of sentiment as you would expect from a retired slaver, turned with a start and bade the performer to stop that 'damned thing.' 'I've heard about enough of that,' he added; 'give us something about the good country we're going too.' A murmur of adhesion ran round the car; the performer took the instrument from his lips, laughed and nodded, and then struck into a dancing measure, and, like a new Timotheus, stilled immediately the emotion he had raised." I like the testimony of the hard-looking man's expletive better than Stevenson's affected criticism.

The following has been "communicated":—

The success of the recent Musical Festival held in Dublin has encouraged its promoters to form an association, to be called the Feis Ceoil, for the purpose of carrying on the work so well begun. The constitution of the new body is modelled on the lines of the Welsh Eisteddfod, which this year, in sympathy with the Irish movement, has offered a prize for the best rendering of an Irish song, open for competition at the coming gathering at Newport to all natives of Ireland. The primal aim of the Feis Ceoil is to promote the study and general cultivation of Irish music, and at the same time to preserve, by publication, the old National airs of the land. The new association has no political or sectarian bias. It is intended that the annual festivals be held for the most part in Dublin, but it is not improbable that Belfast and Cork will from time to time be chosen as the meeting-place.

Mr. Philip Hale has been reviewing some very modern books on art subjects in the Musical Courier. Finding hard sayings, and getting a-weary, he picked up a volume of Walpole's Letters, and found that the people of 1753 were nearer to him than those of our own day. And far more entertaining, I should add. In one of the modern books, Mr. Hale read that the true critic will "provoke the shudder of the Ideal," and "undergo, as the artist, in naïve stupor the powerful suggestions of life." In Walpole he read that Lord Granville was about to marry Lady Juliana Collier: "There are not above two or three and forty years difference in their ages, and not above three bottles difference in their drinking in a day." Mr. Hale preferred Walpole, and I am with him.

The following words of truth and soberness are taken from the Musical Courier, where they appear to be a translation from the Neue Freie Presse:

The fact is the public looks for what it ought not to look—namely, sensation, and hence the rival conductors seek to overtrump each other in their "conceptions" and "intentions," without much regard to the true conception of the piece; they bring forward one detail and suppress another till there is nothing else but details left in the score. The members of the orchestra, at the same time, by being compelled to follow the whims of every new conductor, become merely mechanical instruments. The performer can only play with enthusiasm and freedom when he feels himself an individual. With the countless, uninterrupted variations of tempi of the rubato conductors, with the capricious gestures they make which are supposed not to indicate the best, but the "melos," all individuality is lost, and the player is a mere slave. But there is injury done to the conductors themselves through the prominence given to them. The great attention paid them compels them to assume picturesque poses, as beautiful objects for the eye. Hence come many charming but purposeless gestures, which are better fitted for the ballet. The conductor, whom really it would be best not to see, thus becomes a dark body intercepting the rays of art.

Mr. W. J. Henderson, of the New York Times, has been lecturing on "The Music Critic—What he is and Why he is." Mr. Henderson's words are always well worth weighing, but I must be content now to make a single extract:

I now come to the consideration of certain charges against amusement critics which, in the minds of managers, actors, and musicians, are extremely grave. The first of these can be dismissed very briefly. It is the charge that the critics do not always sit out the performance. The accusation is true. They do not. They would be altogether too stupid for daily journalism if they did. The final answer to this censure of the critics was made by Mr. William Winter, when he said: "It is not necessary to eat the whole of an egg to know that it is bad."

May this be regarded as putting the matter in an egg-shell?

Mr. Sousa, the American bandmaster, has written a March entitled: "The Stars and Stripes for Ever." He did this when in Europe, finishing the work when returning home under a foreign flag. Mr. Sousa told a reporter: "One never feels so patriotic as when under a foreign flag, you know. I have often heard people say that, when in a foreign country, the sight of the Stars and Stripes seems the most glorious in the world." There is something in this, no doubt, for, when in America, I went myself down to the harbour of San Francisco to get sight of the Union Jack after a long course of the other thing. Mr. Sousa's March has three themes—one representing the North, a broad, sweeping subject; another the South, with its languorous beauty and romance; another the West, a strong, pushing melody, carrying all before it.

There has been an American discussion on woman's work in music, and the chairwoman, Mrs. Sutro, delivered an address, from which I take these lines: "Many men, great and little, have denied the possibility of original musical composition to women until this came to be almost a generally accepted axiom. Time, however, will demonstrate what women can do. Work by women will eventually rank as great and immortal as that by men. They will become more skilled in musical composition, because the field of their activity in all other departments has been greatly enlarged." I am sorry for Mrs. Sutro in that this branch of her subject restricted her to the doubtful region of prophecy.

A new horror threatens life. "As you step on the mat to enter Mr. T. J. Armstrong's cosey apartments in Philadelphia, the familiar strains of 'Auld Lang Syne' are heard overhead. The music ceases as you step off the mat. A tiny electric motor, run by battery power, nailed on the wall above the door, runs a small musical box. The pulley on the music box is a home-made affair, and the motor and music box are coupled together with string belting. Yet the little motor is ever ready to move, and the music starts up at once to welcome your entrance." What must the engineer of this device think of his friends when preparing for them such a reception?

In the programme of the Music Teachers' National Association meeting, lately held in New York, was a "Model Church Service by boy choirs, arranged by Entertainment Committee; Miss Laura Sedgwick Collins, chairman."

CHURCH MUSIC.

Whatever may be our doctrinal positions in the vast army of the "Church militant," we are all agreed that the great ecclesiastical movement of the past sixty years or so has been fruitful in good results in many, and in some respects unexpected directions. In no given department of Church life has the fervent craving for the growth of the spirit which loves reverence, order, and beauty been more remarkable than in connection with sacred music.

The members of our Nonconformist bodies have not been backward in this regard. The recent festival of the Nonconformist Choir Union supplied ample evidence of the truth of this assertion. Some of the competing choirs were of the best quality. A good performance by combined choirs numbering about 4,000 singers, admirably directed by Mr. E. Minshall; orchestral pieces by the efficient orchestra of the Union, excellently conducted by Mr. T. R. Croger; and an enormous audience abundantly evidenced the real life dominating this great movement in our Nonconformist churches.

The choirs were "mixed," with the voices of both men and women. The utilisation of the latter is one of the Church music questions of the day. The numerous renderings of oratorios in our cathedrals and churches have accentuated this question with marked force. Curious to say, the judicious employment of the voices of women is no new departure in the Christian Church; and its antiquity has been asserted on the strength of documents said to be in existence in France, in which some allusion is made to the singing of women in church, and the performance of trained vocalists "singing from parchments." The question, broadly speaking, has two aspects: the existence of a ritual or chancel choir, and the presence of a choir of unsurpliced singers taking part in music less immediately connected with the "Offices of the Church," and with music of a congregational type. In our day the return of the oratorio to its original and true home, the Church, has brought into well-defined employment the musical powers of all worshippers endowed with "the sacred gift of song" and possessing some knowledge of music.

The researches and recommendations of the combined committee of well-known organists and architects, whose labours were alluded to in a recent letter in The Times from the pen of the Bishop of Chester, indicate the presence of a choral force in the nave or people's portion of a church, and acknowledge the existence of a chancel choir in large buildings, together with the possible employment of both chancel and nave organs. Our Cathedral festivals present evidence of the effective union of all organised musical forces; and the highest and most complete forms of musical expressions in church are to be finally realised when "with one mind and with one mouth," to quote the simple, eloquent words of the inspired writer, with all available and trained voices, and with both organ and orchestra, we attain more fully the grandeur of praiseful music.

Events move so rapidly that anything said of the Diamond Jubilee seems already out of date. Still this very thought gives force to the evident staying power of some of the music specially composed for that great occasion. Sir George Martin's Te Deum, for instance, produced a marked impression which has remained, and gives promise of an abiding place of usefulness in the future, for a notable setting of the great Church Hymn.

In connection with the 1,300th St. Augustine Commemoration at Canterbury, imposing choral services were held in the stately and venerable Cathedral on the 4th and 6th ult.; at the latter, being the Diocesan Choral Festival, a choir of 970 assembled, including fifty or sixty female singers. No new musical departure was taken—a wise condition in view of surrounding circumstances—and the vast choir sang with great effect such well-known pieces as Tours's Magnificat, Mendelssohn's "How lovely are the Messengers," and Handel's "Hallelujah," with Dr. Longhurst as organist and the Rev. Canon Hichens as conductor. On the 8th ult. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was the appropriately chosen oratorio, and this last of the great Church oratorios of the Bach pattern, with the practical conversion of listeners into worshippers by the medium of the introduced chorals, received an adequate rendering from principals, choir, and band. Sir Frederick Bridge, who gave an interesting organ recital in the Cathedral on the previous evening, and who also contributed a short anthem, entitled "Hosanna! Alleluia," to the Service, was the organist, and Dr. Longhurst conducted.

One interesting feature of the various commemorations of St. Augustine was the singing in the Abbeys of Ampleforth, Erdington, Fort Augustus, in Scotland, and elsewhere, of the Antiphon it is believed the Saint and his followers chanted as they approached Canterbury, to the same notes, found in a twelfth century MS. of the Venerable Bede's "Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ," now one of the Laudian MSS. at Oxford. One argument in favour of the employment of the ancient Plain-Song is the solemn reminder by its use of the worship of our forefathers ages ago; a touching thought-link analogous to, and equally eloquent with the spiritual suggestiveness of those "sermons in stones," our ancient minsters and churches. So must the sounds of this ancient chant have struck living minds, and linked through a vast space of time the souls of "the Saints departed" with the spirits of worshippers "in the Church militant here on earth."

In this connection the volume of "Early English Harmony from the Tenth to the Fifteenth Century," issued recently by the "Plain-Song and Mediæval Society," should command attention.

That Church music should naturally incline to the graver style of ancient times does not prohibit the existence and development of modern sacred art, which meets the requirements of religious thought, and, expressed in modern musical idioms, directly appeals to the emotional feelings of living worshippers. In order to secure the continuity of ecclesiastical gravity and to connect this form of musical eloquence with our present art impulses, the studies of our Church musicians should be characterised by a spirit of historical research as wide as their sympathy with all that is good in modern art is deep.

ORGAN MUSIC.

During the past month sundry excellent and important organs have been brought into use, or, as familiarly stated, "opened." To proceed by order of date, the new instrument at St. Margaret's, Westminster, was employed for the first time on Accession Sunday, June 20, upon a memorable occasion when the members of the House of Commons loyally attended their Parish Church.

The instrument, when completed, will have a great organ of fourteen stops, a swell of fourteen, a choir organ of ten, and a pedal of ten stops. In size and in character of tone, as secured by an admirable selection of "registers," the organ is well adapted for the excellent musical services of the church, and is suitable as regards size and power to the building; the last-named condition being a very satisfactory one. On the ample pedal organ an "open" thirty-two feet stop properly finds a place. To the sixteen-feet reed the name of Bombarde is given, one of the indications of the tendency to re-cast this stop. The eight-feet reed would now be more appropriately named trombone when a pedal register, as fulfilling pretty nearly the function of the orchestral instrument of that name.

An ample supply of coupling and other mechanical movements illustrates another feature of modern organ-building, the provision of the means whereby the tone qualities of any manual may be united with those of any other manual, exactly as any orchestral instrument or combination can be employed with any other tone medium or mediums; the ready manipulation of such effects being secured on the organ by a sufficient supply of composition pedals and pistons. Tubular pneumatic action is successfully applied throughout, and when it is added that the instrument comes from the hands of Messrs. J. W. Walker and Sons it will be recognised that this organ, as regards materials, voicing, and workmanship, is all that can be desired.

An important addition to the long list of fine concert-room organs is the new organ by Willis in the Town Hall at Hove, opened by Mr. H. L. Balfour, on June 30. Some thirty-six sounding stops are distributed over four manuals and pedal organ. The last-named department is somewhat wanting; perhaps through lack of space and from other reasons of economy; an open sixteen-feet stop, a Bourdon, with an eight-feet register somewhat indefinitely designated "octave," and a sixteen-feet trombone make up the list of "registers."

Surely it is high time that all important organs, having sixteen-feet manual stops, should be provided with pedal tone of the thirty-two feet bass foundation octave. Again, this scheme lacks that important eight-feet tone medium, the bass flute, whereby, with the Bourdon soft octave tones, a combination of sixteen and eight feet can be secured without coupling to any one of the manuals. This matter is more important than it looks at first sight, as in certain passages the presence of the bass flute, by securing the piano bass in octaves, leaves all the manuals free from pedal coupling for the preparation of distinct combinations—a special gain in slow movements calling for the employment of varied effects of the piano medium.

It is satisfactory to note the presence of the swell to choir coupler, not always to be found in the specifications of Mr. Willis, but absolutely necessary for the performance of a good deal of modern organ music. The district of Brighton is to be warmly congratulated upon such an important acquisition as a fine specimen of the masterly organ-building art of so eminent a firm as that of Messrs. Henry Willis and Sons.

A very interesting little brochure from the pen of the esteemed organist, Mr. W. H. Stocks, gives an account of the organ in Dulwich College Chapel, together with a description of the instrument as it now stands, with a compact scheme of some twenty-six stops, divided between three manuals and pedal organ. One point is too satisfactory not to be mentioned: the organ is tuned to the normal diapason. Happy choristers of Dulwich College!

The good people of Barnstaple have purchased an organ for concert use, and their Music Hall will be re-opened in October.

A four-manual organ of some fifty stops has been placed in St. Clement's Church, Oxford, the work of Mr. Martin of that city, from the specification of Dr. S. W. Dodds.

The venerable organist of the Temple Church, Dr. E. J. Hopkins, gives an account of the organ now being built for Lincoln Cathedral in the columns of the Organist and Choirmaster. The builders are the famous firm of Messrs. Henry Willis and Sons. With such a noble instrument as that described, the music in the glorious old Minster will receive a new impetus, and the very able Cathedral organist, Dr. G. J. Bennett, will be heard upon an organ worthy of his skill.

Of the month's recitals there is not much to note. Dr. G. H. Smith has given a series at Sculcoates Parish Church, his programmes including Rheinberger's Fantasia Sonata and Sir Frederick Bridge's effective work of the same type in D minor. Mr. J. E. Lord's programme at St. Paul's Presbyterian Church, Harrogate, included an Organ Sonata, by W. Volckmar, on popular German themes, and Berthold Tours's excellent Fantasia in C.

JUBILEE MUSIC.

The following information, received too late for insertion in our last issue, is now added to make the record of Jubilee music more complete.

At Chichester Cathedral, where Dr. F. J. Read is organist, Smart's Te Deum in F and Elvey's anthem "I was glad" were the chief features of the service on Jubilee Day, which was sung by all the city choirs. The music on Accession Day at St. Mary's (Protestant) Cathedral, Limerick, included Martin's Jubilee Te Deum and Antiphon, Bridge's "Blessed be the Lord thy God," and Handel's "Zadok the Priest." A full orchestra and choir, augmented by ladies and gentlemen of the city choirs, excellently rendered a memorable service, under the direction of Mr. Frank Muspratt, the organist. At Lincoln Cathedral, on Accession Day, Smart's Te Deum in F was sung by 400 voices, accompanied by the organ and the volunteer band; and on Jubilee Day Handel's "Zadok the Priest" was sung by an augmented choir of 250 voices, with the additional accompaniment of several brass bands. Dr. George J. Bennett, the Cathedral organist, conducted. Martin's Jubilee Te Deum in A, T. A. Walmisley's "Behold, O God, our Defender," and Handel's "Zadok the Priest" were sung at Newcastle-on-Tyne Cathedral, where Mr. J. E. Jeffries is organist. The evening service on Accession Day was made special at Salisbury, and included Smart in B flat and Handel's "Zadok the Priest," sung under the direction of Mr. C. F. South, the organist. At Ripon Cathedral, on Accession Day, "Thou shalt cause the trumpet of the Jubilee to sound" (Hopkins) and "Zadok the Priest" (Handel); and, on Jubilee Day, Martin's Te Deum and Antiphon and "Blessed be the Lord thy God" (Bridge) were well rendered by an enlarged choir of nearly fifty voices. In the afternoon, 2,500 Sunday school children attended a special service in the nave, when the hymns, as at the above services, were accompanied by the volunteer band. Dr. E. J. Crow, the Cathedral organist, conducted throughout. Dr. Percy C. Buck, organist of Wells Cathedral, reports Stanford in B flat and "Zadok the Priest" (Handel) on Accession Day. The majority of these Jubilee services were attended by the Mayors and Corporations of the various cities, together with the local bodies; and the presence of the military, especially the aid given by their bands, was another feature which helped to make the Jubilee celebration a memorable event both spectacular and musical. We omitted to mention that Sir Herbert Oakeley's hymn "Regina" was sung at Westminster Abbey at the evening service on Accession Day.

CHESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(By our Special Correspondent.)

"The festivals began in 1772, continued till 1829, and were resumed in 1879." So runs a legend on the front page of the prospectus of the present meeting. I have not missed one of the festivals since their resumption; for the earlier doings, on the far side of the gap of fifty years, I can only say that it would be very pleasant to know something more about them than the scanty journalism of the period affords—pleasant, no doubt, because of a comparison favourable to the skill and resources of our own time. Handel went to his rest only thirteen years before the first Chester Festival took place, and could we know the conditions and effects of 1772, we should learn also what a Handelian oratorio performance was in gross and in detail. But our acquaintance with these things must remain of the scantiest, and, after all, we are more concerned with the present than the past, if only because it holds the key of the future in its hands.

The men who were chiefly instrumental in re-establishing the Chester Festival eighteen years ago — conspicuous among them being Dr. J. C. Bridge, then and now organist of the Cathedral, and the Rev. C. H. Hylton Stewart, at that time Cathedral precentor, but at present Vicar of New Brighton—must feel their action to be abundantly justified. Their initiative met with little or no opposition, and the record of the triennial meeting since that time runs on as a story of success. Long may it so continue, for thoroughly good work has been done in a right spirit and with the support of the entire community. In connection with the celebration which took place on the 21st, 22nd, and 23rd ult., no new features presented themselves for notice. Dr. Bridge again gathered round him an efficient body of soloists—Mesdames Anna Williams, Palliser, Hilda Foster, Muriel Foster, and Giulia Ravogli; Messrs. Lloyd, Hirwen Jones, Daniel Price, and Watkin Mills. I cannot pass some of these with mere mention. Miss Anna Williams, who is retiring from public life, appeared at these festivals for the last time, to the great regret of a community which has pleasant recollections of her services and great esteem for her personally. But the best of friends must part, and even parting is better than superfluous lingering on the stage. The Misses Foster are young Northumbrian ladies, who have on their side many engaging qualities, but the time is too soon for conclusion as to the prospects before them. Miss Ravogli made her first appearance in English sacred music, and the event was fraught with important results, seeing that success would almost certainly establish her in our concert-rooms as a contralto of the highest rank. The necessary "hit" was made and the consequences just indicated can hardly fail to ensue. There was no difficulty in obtaining a splendidly efficient chorus from Chester, Yorkshire, and Lancashire; while Manchester, Liverpool, London, and other centres were drawn upon for an excellent orchestra, with Mr. Willy Hess, of Cologne, as principal first violin. The festival executive was thus "furnished unto all good works," and many good works were done.

It is a Chester rule to hold a special service on the Sunday evening in Festival week. This was duly observed on the 18th ult.; the Cathedral being crowded in every part by a congregation which came from far as well as near—by train as well as road. Many persons were necessarily turned from the doors for want of room, so much did city and county desire to hear some good music without paying for it. The chief work performed was, as on former occasions, the "Hymn of Praise"—solos by Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Foster, and Mr. Hirwen Jones. Details are unnecessary, but it may be said that the value of the executive resources received emphatic assertion, and set at rest any doubts as to competency in every department. A better chorus is seldom brought together; tone and attack were superb, and difficulties were so easily mastered that it seemed impossible even for accident to mar the work done.

The days of preparation—Monday and Tuesday—were not wasted. Truth to tell, Dr. J. C. Bridge is a severe task-master. Not sparing himself, neither does he spare others; and when the last rehearsal ended, everybody owned to having had about enough. Old hands probably confessed to more than enough. They could not see the use of going through "Elijah," which is one of the works supposed to take care of themselves. Dr. Bridge does not believe in laissez faire. He even rehearsed the National Anthem. The result was that on Wednesday morning, when the Cathedral bells rang in the first audience, principals, chorus, and orchestra were ready and confident, well aware that nothing had been left to chance. A diversified programme awaited attention. It was in part patriotic and festal; in other part, solemn, not to say funereal; while between these sections stood Part I. of the "Creation." National feeling found expression in "God save the Queen" and "Zadok the Priest," with Sullivan's "Festival Te Deum" as an appendix. I will not say that these things fell rather flat, because the arrangement of the first was new, and the second and third have an independent musical interest. But on the day after the fair cakes are apt to be stale, and appetite for them not very fresh. Anyhow there was a certain belatedness in echoes of the Jubilee. This, however, did not affect the stately character of Handel's anthem, which is to my mind the perfection of pageant music, nor did it make less acceptable the high qualities of Sullivan's Te Deum—a work far too much neglected on occasions of rejoicing. Were the Finale of this piece so changed as to remove the March originally intended for a military band, it would surely come into greater use, for the music is masterly and effective throughout; the beautiful and expressive soprano solo—sung admirably by Miss Palliser—touching the susceptibilities of its hearers even more than the powerful choruses with their jubilant clamour. The fragment of Haydn's oratorio was, so to speak, child's play to the performers, who appeared to enjoy it quite as much as did the audience. And how enjoyable this transparent music is, amid our gathering experience of dark sayings, vague meanings, and unsolvable riddles! Here was a composer who could say anything, and he spake simply, to the point, and with all the fascination of a man who tries to please and not to puzzle. The solos were entrusted to Miss Anna Williams, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Daniel Price, each of whom did very well, Miss Williams so discharging her task as to make the idea of her retirement somewhat difficult to understand. Her rendering of "With verdure clad" had all the old merits and was as acceptable as ever. Mr. Hirwen Jones found the air "Now vanish" too low for him; otherwise he was happy in his work, while Mr. Daniel Price deeply impressed the audience by a show of qualities with which he could hardly have been credited beforehand. He surprised myself, for one, by the excellence of his "Rolling in foaming billows." This artist should oftener be heard in oratorio on important occasions. The choruses were brightly sung, with "The heavens are telling" as a splendid climax.

Graver themes were entered upon with Tschaïkowsky's inevitable "Symphonie Pathétique" and Gounod's "Messe Solennelle." The orchestra had its opportunity in the first-named and made good use thereof. That the work was thoroughly well played, after a short rehearsal, by instrumentalists gathered from various quarters, showed how familiar it has become since its production in this country not long since. I am not going to discuss its qualities, but rather to suggest the symphony as an open book which should be studied by every aspiring composer; not to copy its letter or imitate its devices, but to discover, if possible, the fundamental qualities which in Tschaïkowsky made the work possible. Let Dr. Bridge and his orchestra take credit to themselves for the success of the performance. They are clearly entitled so to do. The Mass, of course, gained much by being heard in a Cathedral, where only it seems at home, and the effect of the solemnly sensuous strains was very great. Its solos were sung by the artists already named as engaged upon the "Creation," and, with their assistance, the morning's doings came to a happy end.

The second performance introduced a novelty in Adolf Jensen's descriptive scene for orchestra, "The Walk to Emmaus," not before heard in England, it is said. Jensen's best friend would hardly claim for him the distinction of having been a great or even a powerful composer. Within a limited sphere, and with restricted means, he succeeded fairly well, but, working with orchestra, he, apparently, could do little more than imitate Wagner. At any rate, we find little more in "The Walk to Emmaus." The main question suggested by this work is one of the fitness of music to describe a sequence of events without the aid of a key to the application of the themes. Apart from a key, Jensen's work is vague in the extreme—a chapter of the Bible told in an indefinite language which allows the meaning of the verses to escape us. As a description, therefore, it is useless and perplexing. I may be told to regard the music as "pure" and not as applied. Certainly that is possible, but in this case unsatisfactory, because the piece has no musical form. It seems to me that if a composer commits himself to a long description of occurrences, he should either provide us with a guide to his arbitrary meaning or put his music into some form which will enable it to stand alone. Jensen did neither, and the audience listened to a number of vague sounds, sometimes pleasant enough in themselves, and at other times somewhat suggestive of a special meaning, if we could only tell what. Works so constructed are at a serious disadvantage, but composers go on making them in the vain hope of overcoming an obstacle which, in the nature of things, is unsurmountable. Dr. Bridge gave the piece a most careful rendering, and if it failed, as I fear it did, the fault lay with the composer, not his interpreters.

"Judas Maccabæus" followed, with Miss Palliser, Miss Ravogli, Miss Hilda Foster, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Mills as representatives of the characters in that warlike oratorio. Handel, as usual, had a throng of votaries. His name remains one to conjure with, especially in connection with this particular work, which is full of songs and choruses permanently inscribed upon the public memory. "From mighty kings," "Father of Heaven," "O lovely peace," "Sound an alarm," "Arm, arm, ye brave," &c., what a roll-call they make, and how old Handelians stir to the sound of them like a war-horse at the blast of a trumpet! The performance was one which could only have come from executants moved to enthusiasm by the subject and its triumphant musical expression. Most notable of the successes was that of Miss Giulia Ravogli. Of course there never was a question concerning this accomplished artist's ability to give the music with effect. Everything turned on her pronunciation of the English text—a matter as to which our public have rightly learned to be exacting. To say that Miss Ravogli sings English like a native would not be true, but her pronunciation is sufficiently good for all practical purposes, and will become better as she gains experience and confidence. For the rest, her beautiful, sympathetic voice and artistic acquirements easily answered, making her début a success which, in effect, adds a first-rate contralto to our list of singers in English. Miss Palliser again outran anticipation. She is developing into an excellent oratorio artist, of which fact let festival managers and concert-givers take note. The repute of Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Mills sufficiently speaks on their behalf. Each vied with the other in calls upon patriotism, and if one was irresistible in sounding an alarm, the other as loudly trumpeted the fact that a noble cause demanded the zeal of Israel. Chorus and orchestra swung through the work with a will, so that again the festival scored a success all round. Well done, Dr. Bridge!

A beautiful morning on Thursday kept up the spirit of the occasion, and once more a goodly gathering occupied nave and aisles, alert to hear two such popular works as Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." Concerning the last-named (second performance this week!) nothing need be said, save that Mr. Lloyd replaced Mr. Hirwen Jones, and made his accustomed effect in the great scena. The beautiful "Stabat" had a rendering worthy of its merits, and that is saying much. It will be assumed that with such artists as Miss Palliser, Miss Ravogli, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills engaged upon the work, its solos had every advantage of interpretation; but the general execution of this difficult music rose to a high standard. Scarcely a flaw, and none of a serious nature, marred the effect, which, by the way, proved once more that there is no place like a cathedral for solemn and moving sacred works; the solemnity being deepened four-fold and the appeal to emotion correspondingly strengthened.

In order to give the chorus a rest, and enable them to enjoy the hospitality of the Duke of Westminster at Eaton Hall, Thursday evening was occupied with a concert of orchestral pieces and songs in the Music Hall. The programme was drawn up to please as many amateurs as possible, and comprised Clay's "I'll sing thee songs of Araby"—called here a "vocal solo"—Gluck's "Che farò" (Miss Ravogli), Max Bruch's Violin Concerto, No. 1 (Mr. Willy Hess), Mackenzie's overture "Britannia," a Rhapsody by Liszt, and several selections from Wagner. These doings were mainly of interest to the local public, and I need not dwell upon them. The attendance was great, the enthusiasm sustained, and the heat almost overpowering. Cannot this festival city build a proper hall? If unable, there is, of course, no more to be said; but if able, the sooner the work is begun the better for Chester's credit.

There was much of interest in Friday morning's programme. To begin with, it included a couple of novelties—Dr. Bridge's "Resurgam" and Mr. Bantock's "symphonic overture" entitled "Saul." With these were associated Spohr's symphony for double orchestra, "The Earthly and the Divine in Human Life"; Schubert's Mass in E flat, and the Introduction and so-called "Love-Feast" from Wagner's "Parsifal." Taking these works in order of performance, Spohr's symphony claims prior attention. I am told—but have not verified the statement—that "The Earthly and the Divine in Human Life" had only twice previously been given in England—once in London, once at Liverpool, under the direction of Julius Benedict. I have heard the late J. W. Davison speak of the London rendering, which he received with more amusement than respect. There is, however, nothing to laugh at in the symphony, although in entering upon such a task, the composer mistook alike his powers and his vocation. How can two orchestras picture to us the earthly and divine in life, save, perhaps, in the grossest way? Spohr was not capable of grossness, and therefore he has pictured nothing to the point; simply giving us three movements in which some melodious themes are treated in an interesting way by a small orchestra (the Heavenly) and a large one (the Earthly). The Finale, perhaps, may be regarded as having most character, and certainly the closing section, where the Heavenly becomes, so to speak, all in all, strikes me as very beautiful and touching. The work is best heard apart from any questions arising out of its title, and then it appears quite worthy of revival. For myself, I am delighted to have heard music which has often been in my thoughts, without any attendant hope of making its acquaintance in the only satisfactory manner.

Mr. Granville Bantock's overture is styled "symphonic," I suppose, because it is planned and treated in a large way. The question, however, may be regarded as immaterial, the point being whether it indicated an advance on the part of the composer and ability to succeed in a task of high importance. From the title, "Saul," it is easy to conclude that the general character of the work is passionate and tragic. There is much to justify this deduction, but the overture has various episodes—one in which the organ figures largely, as, it may be supposed, the representative of music; and another of a Spanish or Moorish character, the purport of which does not readily appear to an unaided listener. I must know much more of the overture before giving a decided opinion upon it, but I was impressed with a sense of power and command of resource such as bespoke respectful treatment for the essay and encouraged hope of a convincing success. Mr. Bantock conducted in person.

I come now to the new work contributed by the energetic musical chief of the festival, who, amid many preoccupations, found time to compose a work to a poem by the late Rev. Gerard Moultrie. The "argument" of the verses is indicated by their title, "Resurgam." It begins, like that of Brahms's German "Requiem," with affirming the blessedness of the dead who die in the Lord, "theirs is true peace." Then it contemplates the living who are still detained on earth, pointing out that Jesus also lived here His ordained time, and that His followers should not shrink from the struggle of life. Next follows a profession of faith in the Redeemer, and a lengthened ascription to Him of thanksgiving and praise. Dr. Bridge, who dedicates the work to the memory of his parents, has treated the subject in most sympathetic fashion. The music obviously comes from the heart, and this explains why, amid much that is simple and unpretending, it holds attention and excites feeling. Here is a case of happy effects produced by natural and unpretending means—a process rarely accomplished unless the composer is deeply moved. The music freely follows the words, and on every page I recognise some happy thought, some definite and distinctive touch which has nothing to do with commonplace. The every-day talk of a composer, flowing glibly from his lips, is not here, and, if space permitted a review of the work, I should have no difficulty in showing that, with all its simplicity, the music of "Resurgam" contains some of the best and finest qualities of the art. This report of the festival is already so long that I must refrain from particulars. Enough that Dr. Bridge's touching and comforting effusion, in pious recognition of honoured memories, deserves abundant good fortune, and, if there be justice in fate, will have it.

The festival closed on Friday evening with "Elijah." There remains only to congratulate all concerned upon a distinguished success. I have had experience of over eighty festivals in England, but can recall few that gave more uniform satisfaction than the one whose record I now close.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

The two most memorable events of the concluding portion of the Grand Opera season at Covent Garden have been the introduction to England, on the 2nd ult., of Dr. Kienzl's "Der Evangelimann" and the original production, on the 14th ult., of an opera in three acts and four scenes, entitled "Inès Mendo," by Fred. Regnal, the nom de guerre adopted by Mr. F. d'Erlanger to avoid being confused with another composer.

A succès d'estime was all that awaited the first of these novelties. The composer, Dr. Wilhelm Kienzl, is new to England and was all but unknown on the Continent till this Op. 45 of his, first produced at Berlin three years ago and, since then, at almost every German and Austrian theatre, brought him into notice. We are of opinion that Dr. Kienzl has been somewhat roughly handled by a portion of the London press. He modestly calls his work a "Musikalisches Schauspiel" (musical play), not "opera," nor "music-drama," and whoever expected a work answering to either of these latter descriptions was bound to be disappointed. We claim no manner of greatness for this latest popular success of the German lyric stage, but we confess that in spite of some startling reminiscences of other composers to be found in the music, the simple drama (based on fact), and the always appropriate and frequently impressive music interested and even touched us. For though we know our Wagner backwards and can rave about "Tristan" and the "Ring" and "Parsifal" with the youngest of our confrères; though Brahms can hardly be too deep, nor Richard Strauss, Max Schillings, Alfred Bruneau, or the modern Russians too daring or brilliant for our taste, still we are not yet sufficiently blasé to remain unmoved by such a very human tale as Dr. Kienzl unfolds to us, or not to listen with considerable pleasure to his music. The latter is not remarkable for its originality, yet it possesses the great advantage of being well-made and generally sounding charming in our ears! Originality is a precious gift, but not the one and only end a composer should strive to attain. Let him give us beautiful music, let him charm our wearied ears "with concords of sweet sound," and we will not expect him to have the genius of a Wagner, to invent a style of his own, and a new one for every work he may compose. We will even gladly forgive him if he occasionally helps himself from the inexhaustible gold mine of Wagner's imperishable masterpieces. As the work is not likely to be heard again after this season, being much too unsophisticated in its terribly sad plot, and too little exciting in its music to suit a Covent Garden audience, it is hardly worth while to describe it in detail. Suffice it to say that Dr. Kienzl can be equally effective, in a somewhat limited way, in such simple, homely scenes as that in Act I., where a comic tailor with a funny name, Zitterbart (delightfully played by Herr Lieban), wins a game of skittles by a fluke; and that in Act II., where the Evangelimann (anglicé, itinerant preacher) teaches a group of children a hymn; or in the charming, though (longo intervallo) Tristanesque love duet and the dramatically very powerful scene of reconciliation between the brothers. In this last-named scene the music is steeped in Wagner, but there is no denying its effectiveness or cleverness. Superbly was this scene played and sung by Mr. van Dyck and Mr. Bispham, and it impressed us very powerfully; so much so, indeed, that during its progress we hardly thought of analysing our own impressions of the music per se. Here we had a genuine instance of the music being subordinate to the play and yet helping it, as only music can, towards creating its greatest possible emotional effect. This scene bids us hope that Dr. Kienzl may yet produce a fine music-drama. Miss Marie Engle, Madame Schumann-Heink, and Mr. Lemprière Pringle were excellent in smaller rôles, and a capital performance was ably conducted by M. Flon.

The librettists of "Inès Mendo" are MM. Pierre Decourcelle and A. Liorat, who for their story have gone to Prosper Mérimée, and taken the tale of the hangman's daughter. As treated by them the incidents make some demands on the credulity of the audience, but they are in themselves rational outcomes of their premises and are cleverly contrived for effective musical illustration and dramatic contrast. The work opens gaily in the market place of Monclar, Galicia—time, the spring of 1640. The village folk are concluding their bargaining by singing drinking songs, and the Notary is entertaining the local priest and some friends under the verandah of the inn. The music is bright and sparkling, and the spirit of gaiety is intensified by the dainty embroideries by the orchestra of the vocal themes. Inès is the village belle, and in a merry trio she is joked by her companions concerning the destination of a sword knot she is working. The personage for whom it is intended is Salvador, the son of the Duke of Mendoza. The latter, however, does not object, as might have been expected, to the union, and when the lovers meet they sing the conventional duet of mutual bliss, upon which the curtain descends, the most memorable music being a pretty ballad, "C'est le printemps," sung by Inès on her first entrance. The scene of the next act is the garden of Mendo's house. No execution has taken place in Monclar for two generations, and no one (save the Notary) seems to know that Mendo is, by hereditary law, the public executioner. When, however, the Duke asks him to let Salvador marry Inès, Mendo decides to tell his daughter that night his unfortunate position. Before he does so a tragic event happens. As evening closes the Notary's nephew, Carlos, who has been smitten with the charms of Inès, sings a pretty serenade under her window. Salvador, apparently on like business intent, objects. Rapiers take the place of guitars, and Carlos is killed. Villagers are heard singing a merry chorus as they return from a festive gathering, and to avoid them Salvador induces Inès to let him into her father's house. The finest music is heard in the subsequent scene. Mendo tells his daughter his real vocation, and Inès agrees with him that she ought not to disgrace Salvador's name; but Salvador, who had been hidden behind some curtains, refuses to agree to her sacrifice. The lovers, however, are interrupted by the arrival of the local police and apparently the entire populace of Monclar, and the curtain falls on the arrest of Salvador. The musical interest in the last act diminishes, one reason being the rapidity with which important events follow each other. Salvador is condemned to be beheaded, but is permitted to marry Inès in a side chapel conveniently adjoining his cell. The lovers are allowed a last duet, but the composer has failed to make this impressive. Finally Mendo is called upon to fulfil his duties, but prefers to stab himself, the wound being mortal or otherwise according to the decision of the management—the composer having provided an alternative conclusion—after which the Duke arrives with a free pardon for Salvador. Viewed in its entirety the music is deficient in originality. Its conception and character reflect the style of Gounod and Bizet, but it is always well written, pleasing, and refined, and in the second portion of the second act attains considerable expressive power. The orchestration is extremely vivacious in the lighter scenes, but lacks sonority and richness in the tragic portions. There is a well developed overture, in which the "fatality theme," subsequently associated with Mendo's anguish of mind at his hideous office, and other subjects, are deftly interwoven; but no complex contrapuntal devices are attempted, and the music is always easy to follow, a fact which contributed in considerable measure to the favourable reception which the opera received. The title rôle was sustained in a sympathetic manner by Madame Saville, and M. Alvarez was, as usual, an impassioned lover. As Juan Mendo, M. Renaud was earnest and refined, and Messrs. Bonnard, Jacques Bars, Gilibert, and Journet also gave efficient personations of their respective parts. M. Flon conducted.

The other performances are chiefly concerned with the re-appearances of well-known artists in familiar parts. Madame Melba has appeared several times and shown advance as an actress; but the management has had to depend, for the most part, on Madame Eames. With this artist's help and the assistance of the brothers De Reszke, M. Plançon, and Mr. David Bispham, a very fine performance was given on June 30 of "Die Meistersinger." This rendering was memorable for being begun at seven o'clock, with the result that the famous "Prize Song" was heard before eleven, probably for the first time at Covent Garden.

Some antiquarian interest was attached to the performances of Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro" and "Don Juan" by the use of a harpsichord, played by Mr. Dolmetsch in the recitativo secco; but taking into consideration the volume of tone of the modern orchestra as compared with that of Mozart's day, it would be more consistent to employ a pianoforte in such passages. At the rendering of the former work, on the 9th ult., the part of Susanna was successfully sustained by Madame Clementine de Vere, a well-trained vocalist possessing an agreeable voice and attractive presence. The title rôle of Don Juan was intelligently embodied, on the 13th ult., by M. Renaud, and an excellent personation of Leporello was presented by M. Fugère. It is to be regretted, however, that in the renderings of both these operas return was made to traditional absurdities which would be more honoured in the breach than in the observance.

Reviewing the season, the new management may be congratulated on having fairly overcome many difficulties, not the least of which has been the non-appearance of Mesdames Calvé and Nordica, and the apparent limitation to a small number of works. Commendable endeavour has been shown on several occasions to improve the scenic effects and to galvanize the choristers into actions suggestive of human beings in moments of excitement, and although in "Die Meistersinger" they stood placidly in a row during what should have been the street fight, on other occasions, as in the ball-room scene in "Don Juan," they showed timely vivacity.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

We have a suggestion to make to the directors of the Philharmonic Society. Seeing that they have just announced an autumn series of concerts, at which several eminent Continental musicians are to conduct some of their own compositions, we would suggest that at each of these concerts an important work by a British composer be also performed. We are of opinion that something should be done to acquaint foreign musicians visiting England of the enormous strides which we have made in our art within the last decade or two, and that our own native composers are producing works fit to hold their own by the side of some of the best that reach us from the Continent. For this purpose it would of course be necessary to select from the very best of our foremost composers' works, and secure the finest possible performances thereof. We were moved to make these remarks because at the society's last concert, on the 1st ult., the Russian composer, Alexander Glazounow, before conducting his own fourth Symphony, was regaled with an overture, "Spring and Youth," by Mr. Herbert Bunning, a clever young artist, whose music cannot, however, as yet lay any claim to great distinction. It is spirited, tuneful, and well-made, but hardly the sort of work to give a foreigner a very high idea of the quality of English music. This we consider a great pity. Mr. Glazounow's symphony is his Op. 48 and stands in the key of E flat. It is not so characteristically Russian as his No. 5, which Mr. Henry Wood produced some months ago, and we almost like it better for that reason, for we confess that we do not care one jot for the much vaunted "nationalism" in music unless that nationalism produces beautiful as well as "characteristic" music; and a great deal of the Russian music lately introduced to Londoners, though very characteristic, appears to us almost devoid of beauty We refuse to believe that Englishmen will ever become greatly attached to the effusions of the Russian school unless the latter assimilates Western ideas—i.e., comes more strongly under the influence of the great classic masters of music. In this connection we may point out that what in England is considered the greatest achievement of the Russian school so far—viz., the stupendous first movement of Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, is also the least essentially Russian of that master's pieces. It is great not because it is Russian, nor merely because it displays phenomenal strength, superb workmanship, gorgeous colour, &c., though these qualities go for much, but because it is heart-music in which a master speaks to us in accents of suffering and despair, hope and resignation, which go straight to the heart and move us to tears in spite of ourselves. This is beautiful, great music, and of such the Russians have given us all too little. They have, in fact, revealed to us next to nothing of the heart of their great people. When they begin to do so, they will produce beautiful music which will appeal with equal force to all music-lovers irrespective of nationality, for the human heart is the same all the world over. At present we are too frequently reminded of Bismarck's "Scratch a Russian and find a Tartar" when listening to the wild effusions which some Russian composers inflict upon us. There is little depth of feeling in Mr. Glazounow's symphony, and it almost seems as if we must not expect much from him in this respect, seeing that he has refrained (wisely, perhaps) from attempting a slow movement in this work, while that in his subsequent symphony (No. 5), though agreeably melodious, displays but a somewhat sentimental kind of passion. To compensate us for the absence of an Adagio in the work under notice, the composer precedes both his first and last movements by lengthy Andantes, that before the former containing the best theme in the work, a graceful, languorous, and charmingly melodious strain in E flat minor, of which much is made later on. The first Allegro is the most individual portion of the symphony, and full of fresh, attractive, and beautifully scored music. The Scherzo is a delightful Allegro vivace, one of those spontaneous, sprightly pieces which captivate an audience completely on a first hearing, and for all their apparent simplicity and rhythmic tunefulness "occur" only to exceptionally gifted composers. The Finale is the most important part of the symphony. Here M. Glazounow gives us a really astonishing display of strength and science. No doubt he plumes himself on his polyphony, and we are bound to admire his masterfulness; yet our composer, like Keats's owl, "for all his feathers was a-cold." The music did not impress us at all, and we were not sorry when the long delayed final bar was at last reached. A second performance may cause us to alter our opinion, but at present we consider the Finale the least interesting part of the symphony. The composer conducted, and, after a capital performance, was warmly applauded by the audience. Mr. Alexander Siloti played Beethoven's E flat Pianoforte Concerto with fine technique but hardly sufficient expression; Mdlle. Camilla Landi, admirable artist that she is, did complete justice to the air "Printemps qui commence," from Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Delila," and two airs by Handel; and a pompous and pointed performance of the "Meistersinger" overture, conducted by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, completed the programme.

THE LEEDS FESTIVAL CHOIR IN LONDON.

One of the very best and most enjoyable concerts of the season was that given at the Queen's Hall, on the 8th ult., in honour of the foreign delegates to the International Congress of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers. We do not know who conceived the idea of giving this concert, but we take it that his or their object was threefold—viz., to give our guests a taste of the quality of modern British music; to show them what the "unmusical English" can do in the way of choral singing; and to demonstrate to them that the teaching imparted by our foremost music schools is productive of most excellent results, especially in regard to our splendid orchestral players. For this purpose the programme included compositions by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Dr. C. Hubert H. Parry, Sir Arthur Sullivan, and Professor C. Villiers Stanford; a contingent of 225 members of the Leeds Festival Choir of 1895 was organised by Mr. Frederick R. Spark, J.P., Hon. Secretary to the Leeds Festival Committee, and specially brought to the metropolis; and the first-rate orchestra of 113 performers consisted, with the exception of nineteen, of present or former pupils of the Royal College of Music. To our guests, and to Londoners too, the chief attraction lay no doubt in the choir, than which a finer body of voices has never been heard in London. There were contingents from Leeds (seventy-seven), Bradford (thirty-nine), Huddersfield (thirty-seven), Halifax (forty-two), Dewsbury (nineteen), and Batley (eleven), and they formed a perfectly balanced, compact body of singers who thrilled us with their superb tone, sonorous and penetrating, yet mellow and charmful; by their splendid, fearless attack and well-sustained, swinging movement, suggestive of a plentiful, well-managed supply of breath and a good sense of rhythm. For breadth, sonority, gorgeous colour, nobility of style, and perfection of ensemble we can only compare the effect of their magnificent singing in Dr. Hubert Parry's ode "Blest Pair of Sirens"—still his greatest achievement, and, in our opinion, without a compeer in British music—to that produced by the playing of, say, Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture or "Kaisermarsch" by Dr. Hans Richter's orchestra. This supreme effort of the Yorkshire singers, right worthily assisted by the fine College orchestra, dwells in the memory as a great event: a perfect and unsurpassable performance of a noble masterpiece. We have heard nothing so splendid, so inspiriting and elevating since we sat under the spell of that magnificent Finale to Act III. of "Die Meistersinger" at Bayreuth some years ago. It was almost a pity that Dr. Parry's work was placed second in the programme, for all that came after it suffered by comparison. The concert opened with Sir Alexander C. Mackenzie's delightful "Britannia" overture, which was hardly played with sufficient spirit and rhythmic accuracy. Sir Arthur Sullivan was represented by the Prologue to his "Golden Legend," in which, strange to say, the tenors and basses all but missed an entry (and a very simple one too!), no doubt through misinterpreting the conductor's beat. The part of Lucifer was finely declaimed by Mr. Andrew Black, who was, however, heard to even greater advantage in Professor Stanford's vigorous and exhilarating settings for bass solo, male chorus, and orchestra of three "cavalier tunes" by Robert Browning, the third of which, "Marching along," had to be repeated. Out of compliment, we suppose, to the foreign delegates in whose honour the concert was given, the programme included four compositions, representing Italy, Germany (with Austria), Russia, and France respectively. The last-named supplied nothing more substantial than the pretty Waltz from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet," while Russia had the largest share of the honours with Tschaïkowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" Fantasia for orchestra, which we believe the lamented composer considered one of his best works, but which we hold to be as ugly a nightmare as was ever committed to paper and called music. Italy contributed the long and impressive Scena for Desdemona from Act IV. of Verdi's "Otello," including the "Willow Song" and "Ave Maria," while Germany was represented by Brahms's jovial Academic Festival Overture, the performance of which possessed additional interest through the "Gaudeamus igitur" at the end, played by the wind instruments, being also sung by the chorus in four-part harmony to the following verse from the old German students' song, merely altering "qui" to "quæ" in the second line, to suit "this happy isle":—

||: Vivat et Respublica,
Et quæ illam regit, :||
Vivat nostra civitas,
Mæcenatum caritas,
||: Quæ nos hic protegit. :||

The idea is very felicitous and the effect was distinctly good, though the jubilantly rushing demisemiquaver scale passages for the fiddles were somewhat overwhelmed by those stentorian Yorkshire voices. Lest purists should object to this fresh case of "tampering with the classics," we may state that, according to a note in the programme, these choral parts were first sung with the sanction of the composer, at Cambridge, in 1892. The programme was completed by the choruses "The people shall hear" and "Sing ye to the Lord" (solo, Madame Albani) from Handel's "Israel in Egypt," in which all the fine qualities of the Yorkshire singers shone resplendent. It but remains for us to add that the orchestra distinguished itself greatly, especially in the very difficult Fantasia by Tschaïkowsky, which was splendidly played; that Madame Albani created much enthusiasm by her singing of the above-named selections from Gounod and Verdi; and that Professor Stanford conducted throughout with loving care and conspicuous ability. His effective arrangement of the National Anthem (solo, Madame Albani) closed a memorable concert. The original version of the words was sung, although the specially invited audience included so many foreigners. No doubt in this year of Jubilee, and at the end of such a concert, even they were quite ready to join in the cry of "God save the Queen."

THE HANDEL SOCIETY.

The concert at the Queen's Hall on Tuesday, June 29, was one of the most successful ever given by this association, which for the present prefers to give invitation concerts and not to appeal to the general public. There was nothing composed by Handel in the first part of the programme, which commenced with Schumann's rarely-heard "New Year's Song." This effective choral composition was an outcome of the master's career in Dresden when he was conductor of two societies, one for men only and the other for mixed voices. The "New Year's Song" is partly sacred and partly secular; it ends with a version of the Lutheran choral "Now thank we all our God." Next came Schubert's "Song of Miriam," written in 1828, the last year of the composer's life, when he worked as if he had a premonition that the night was coming when no man can work. The soprano solo part was nicely sung by Miss Helen Jaxon. Mr. Edward German's picturesque overture to "Richard III." followed, and the first section of the programme concluded with Professor Villiers Stanford's clever choral ballad "Phaudrig Crohoore," conducted by the composer and very well rendered. The second part was devoted to the master after whom the society is named, and commenced with the Organ Concerto (No. 2, in A, from the third set), published by Walsh after Handel's death. Mr. E. G. Croager was an efficient soloist and added a capital cadenza from his own pen. The concert ended with the familiar Coronation anthem "The King shall rejoice," and the conductor, Mr. G. S. Liddle, may be congratulated on his successful efforts.

VARIOUS RECITALS.

One of the first pianoforte recitals claiming mention this month is that of Miss Annie Burghes, which took place at the Salle Erard on Saturday afternoon, June 26. The young lady continues to improve in manipulative dexterity and artistic feeling, and it says much for her talent that she was at her best in pieces by Chopin, including the famous Polonaise in A flat (Op. 47) and the Study in G flat from the second book.

A pianoforte recital was given at the Queen's (Small) Hall by Miss Edie Barnett, a pupil of Miss Fanny Davies, on Friday afternoon, the 2nd ult. The juvenile executant is stated to be only twelve years of age, and therefore her efforts are scarcely amenable to criticism. It may be said, however, that she has dawning ability of no mean order, and that in the first movement of Bach's Clavier Concerto in D minor and Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillant in B minor (Op. 22) Miss Barnett had the aid of Miss Davies, who played on a second pianoforte an arrangement of the orchestral accompaniments. The solos included some pieces by Schumann, Sterndale Bennett, and Stephen Heller.

Miss Gertrude Palmer, who gave a pianoforte recital in the Queen's (Small) Hall on Saturday afternoon, the 3rd ult., comes from Sydney, New South Wales. "Advance, Australia," seems to be the motto of many young and aspiring musicians hailing from the Antipodes, and there is no reason whatever why Miss Gertrude Palmer should not eventually take a leading place in her profession, as she has unquestionable ability. Her programme included a number of minor pieces by Schütt, Chopin, Heller, Liszt, and Brahms, besides Beethoven's Sonata in D (Op. 10, No. 3) and Chopin's Rondo in C for two pianofortes (Op. 73), in which she was assisted by Mr. Algernon Ashton.

Miss Edith A. Greenhill was responsible for a pianoforte recital at the Salle Erard on Tuesday evening, the 6th ult. A pianoforte recital in the evening is somewhat of a novelty, but Miss Greenhill secured a large and fashionable audience. Commencing with preludes by Bach, Handel, and Mendelssohn, she passed to Brahms's fine Variations on a theme by Schumann (Op. 9), to which she did much justice. Beethoven's Sonata in D minor (Op. 31, No. 2) was well played, the lovely Adagio in B flat being especially interpreted with the taste it demands. Pieces by Field, Chopin, Liszt, Cramer, Steibelt, Henselt, and Rubinstein brought the performance to a conclusion.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The 246th concert, given on June 23, was orchestral and commenced very appropriately with the National Anthem (Professor Stanford's arrangement). A note on the programme invited the audience to join in the last verse. Needless to say the audience was much too shy, or "respectable," or blasé, or unmusical—we cannot divine which—to do anything so calculated to let its every individual member make an exhibition of him or herself. We noticed the same lack of patriotic sentiment, as it should show itself on such occasions, at the Jubilee and final concerts of the Philharmonic Society, when Sir Alexander C. Mackenzie turned to the audience, and, with unmistakable signs, urged them to join in the National Anthem. A few people near us, like Ralph Rackstraw in "H.M.S. Pinafore," "hummed a little," and the writer and his friend were stared at for chiming in lustily, but beyond these weak efforts the experiments were ghastly failures. Why this reluctance to sing on such conspicuous occasions? What would not a Yorkshire or a German audience do under similar circumstances? Are we, after all, still *un*musical, or getting too musical? Which is it? To return to our College concert: After the very heavy fare of the previous orchestral concert, when only works by Brahms were played, it was no doubt thought advisable to have a thorough change. Hence we had the funniest of dear "Papa" Haydn's symphonies—viz., the mock heroic "Military"—Cherubini's ever fresh "Anacreon" and Auber's jolly "Le Cheval de Bronze" overtures. That the young players enjoyed them, their smiling faces seemed to prove, yet we fancy their smiles had something of superiority about them. At any rate, we have heard the orchestra play much better on occasions when much more difficult and deeper works were before them. Ivor Foster's resonant baritone voice did full justice to the dramatically declaimed air, "Woo thou thy snowflake," from Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Ivanhoe" (surely a strangely unfit song to sing before a roomful of young people!), while Katherine Kips essayed with some success the hackneyed though beautiful "Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix," from Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila." An important novelty was Tschaïkowsky's third Pianoforte Concerto in E flat (Op. 75), a work which, in its one movement, seemed to us to inflict as much "harsh din" and wanton ugliness upon a long-suffering audience as the much maligned Liszt never dreamt of in his philosophy! We should like to recommend this so-called concerto by the terribly unequal composer of the magnificent "Pathetic" symphony and the exquisitely refined "Nutcracker" ballet music to those superior persons who still call Liszt's concertos "ugly." Why, they are things of beauty and a joy for ever by the side of this effusion of Tschaïkowsky's. We were particularly disenchanted by the ineffective, uncouth scoring, which displayed all Tschaïkowsky's weaknesses and mannerisms and scarcely any of his great gifts in this branch of his art. Maud Gay played the strange work very well though, with excellent technique and considerable aplomb.

At the following concert, on June 30, a new Quintet for pianoforte, flute, clarinet, horn, and bassoon, by a scholar, William Hurlstone, was produced by the composer, Eli Hudson, Frederick Moss, Herbert Thornton, and Edwin Cox, and proved an effective little work. The thematic material is fresh and attractive, its treatment concise, spirited, and interesting, while the "tone colour" produced by the beautiful combination of instruments is always chaste, though rich, and sufficiently varied throughout the course of the three movements not to weary the ear by monotony. The clever work deserves to be performed in public, and we herewith recommend it to those gentlemen to whom we look for wind instrument chamber concerts. Otie Chew gave a dashing, temperamentful (to anglicise an expressive German adjective) performance of Wieniawski's Polonaise Brillante for violin (Op. 21, No. 2), and William Read, C. B. Squire, Edward Behr, and R. Purcell Jones did ample justice to Borodine's second String Quartet in D, a work which cannot lay the least claim to greatness or even distinction, though it contains a pretty Notturno with an effective little canon, two in one at the octave and at a beat's distance.

Another chamber concert, on the 14th ult., proved one of the best we have ever attended at the College. This was chiefly due to the excellent, tuneful, expressive, and well-rehearsed performances given by Herbert Hamilton, William Read, Edward Behr, and Robert Grimson of Brahms's noble Pianoforte Quartet in G minor; and by Samuel Grimson, Ethel Rooke, Edward Behr, and R. Purcell Jones of Tschaïkowsky's E flat minor String Quartet (Op. 30), a fine work of high aim and genuine achievement, which stands head and shoulders above the same composer's more favourite D major Quartet. Mary Noverre proved herself another addition to the long list of gifted violin pupils of the College, by her excellent playing of Saint-Saëns's fine (and strangely German!) Concertstück in one movement, to the great difficulties and varying moods of which she did full justice. Edgar Bainton's teacher had set him an appalling task in Schumann's great Pianoforte Sonata in G minor (Op. 22), but by his capital performance, displaying a good technique, considerable feeling, and careful thought, he proved himself not unworthy of the trust put in him. Wallace Kennedy, a refined, light lyric tenor; James McInnes, a promising sonorous bass-baritone; and Mabel Bond, a light soprano, requiring yet a good deal of further training, sang Schubert's "Der Neugierige," Lully's "Bois épais," and Purcell's quaint Knotting Song respectively.

At the final concert of the term, on the 23rd ult., the orchestra gave excellent performances of Weber's "Oberon" Overture, Grieg's second "Peer Gynt" Suite, and Glazounow's fifth Symphony. Robert Grimson played Saint-Saëns's Violoncello Concerto with good tone and technique, and Agnes Nicholls and Thos. Thomas sang the beautiful love duet from Verdi's "Otello" (Act II.) in capital style. We have now heard M. Glazounow's Symphony twice and we do not hesitate to protest against a work with such an ugly movement as the Finale being taught at one of our chief music schools. We confess to having twice suffered agonies in listening to this outrageous cacophony, and we are not thin-skinned. The champions of "nationalism" will tell us that this is the best movement in the work, because it is the most Russian and "so characteristic"; they may even assure us that we do not require beauty in music. We shall continue to hold exactly opposite views. If they find beauty here, it must be of the kind which some people see in the abnormally developed biceps of the professional strong man. If we are wrong, if this is the coming art and our protests avail no more than did those of previous generations against the new arts of their times, we shall be happy to take off our hat to M. Glazounow with a Morituri te salutant, and stoically retire to await what we shall consider the doom of the beautiful in music, even as Wotan, the god, awaited the "Götterdämmerung."

The fourteenth annual general meeting was held on the 17th ult., at Marlborough House. The Prince of Wales (President) occupied the chair.

Mr. Charles Morley, M.P. (Hon. Secretary), read the annual report of the Council to the Corporation, which showed the number of pupils (scholars and paying students) on the registers at the close of the last term to be 347. The Report mentions, among other details, the successful opening of a junior department for young pupils at reduced fees; also the introduction of a reduced fee for pupils who have studied at the College for a period of three years, and who were desirous of remaining for the special cultivation of their principal study; the adoption of the low pitch, the founding of various prizes and exhibitions, and various valuable appointments obtained by pupils during the past year.

The Prince of Wales, in moving "That the report of the Council be received and adopted," said: "I think it must be patent to everybody that the College is in a most satisfactory condition. We are very much indebted to Dr. Parry, the director, for the great energy he has shown ever since he has been in office, and I hope that he will continue in office for a long time to come, so that the College may occupy the position that such an important institution should hold. In conclusion, I cannot omit reference to a painful subject, the loss we have sustained by the death of Lord Charles Bruce. A more charming and amiable man I have never met, and I do not think anybody could have taken a deeper interest in the College, or have been more anxious for its welfare. It is a matter of sincere regret that he has been taken from us."

The Prince of Wales afterwards presented the Hopkinson Gold Medal for pianoforte playing to Miss Beatrice Cerasoli, and the Challen and Son Gold Medal for pianoforte playing to Mr. William Morgan.

A competition for the Joseph Maas Memorial Prize took place on the 7th ult., the winner being Mr. Thos. Thomas, Cefnmawr, North Wales; commended, Mr. Kennedy (Australian scholar).

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The concluding students' concert of the summer term of the Royal Academy of Music took place on the 21st ult., at St. James's Hall, and gave abundant proof of good teaching. The programme was opened with two movements from Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in G minor (Op. 25), which were meritoriously interpreted by Miss Marion White, Mr. Aldo Antonietti, Mr. Vernon Addison, and Miss May Mukle. The last-named executant subsequently played two violoncello solos with much acceptance, and Mr. Bernard C. Flanders and Mr. Claude F. Pollard gave a brilliant rendering of Moscheles's duet for two pianofortes, "Hommage à Handel." The most memorable feature of the concert was an admirable reading, by Miss Gertrude Drinkwater, Miss Gertrude Booth, Mr. R. Whitworth Mitton, and Mr. Ford Waltham, of Madame Liza Lehmann's song-cycle, "In a Persian Garden," the singing of the soprano and bass vocalists showing most promising abilities. Two MS. songs, well sung by Mr. Mitton, and severally entitled "My lady's face is fair" and "To the cold, dark night," by Mr. Percy Hilder Miles, proved clever and sympathetic settings of some depressing lines, and the composer may be encouraged to persevere. Miss Isabel Jay sang with much feeling a carefully-written MS. lyric by Mr. Aldo Antonietti, and Miss Margaret Drysdale evinced dramatic perception in her delivery of Rebecca's prayer from Sullivan's "Ivanhoe."

The following afternoon, in the same hall, the Princess of Wales, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, distributed the awards to the successful candidates of the Institution. Sir Alexander Mackenzie, in making his usual remarks, referred to the prosperous condition of the Academy, and said that with regard to the events of the past year the Institution found itself, save for the presence that afternoon of their Royal Highnesses, in the happy position believed to be enjoyed by the nation that had no history. They were, however, about to lose the services of a valued sister professor, Madame Sherrington, who had chosen to seek that repose which she richly deserved after a long and brilliant career. Two new scholarships, named after their donors, Dove and Mence Smith, for violin and singing respectively, were to be presented for the first time on that occasion. Among the recently added prizes were the Betjemann gold medal, in memory of a lost son, for operatic singing; the Sauret prize, a gift of their distinguished professor of the violin; two annual prizes for elocution, from an ex-pupil (Miss Charlotte Walters); and two gold medals for the best performances in the highest section of the pianoforte classes at the annual examination, the gift of Mr. Walter Macfarren, in commemoration of his professional jubilee. He was pleased also to say that Mr. Threlfall's gift last year of £100 to the Students' Aid Fund had induced others to contribute to the extent of £415. After the Princess had distributed the awards, and Lord Herschell had proposed a vote of thanks to the Prince and Princess, which was seconded by Mr. Thomas Threlfall, the Prince of Wales, in returning thanks, expressed his and the Princess's satisfaction at the gratifying account they had heard of the progress of the Academy, and said that after the admirable, though short, vocal and instrumental concert they had listened to, it must have been recognised how very efficient the pupils were, how carefully they were taught, and what pains they took in acquiring an art which was becoming more and more appreciated by every country. He stood there in a somewhat peculiar position, for he had the honour of being the president of the Royal College of Music. There might be rivalry between the institutions, but he felt sure it was only of a friendly description, and that the desire and wish of both institutions were to promote the art of music in all its branches, and in doing so to merit the approbation of the country. The proceedings were terminated with the National Anthem, and three ringing cheers from the young musicians followed the Prince and Princess as they left the hall. Previous to the distribution M. Sauret conducted a spirited rendering, by the violin ensemble class, of an arrangement of Paganini's "Moto perpetuo," the female choir sang the chorus "The mistress we adore," from Sir Alexander Mackenzie's comic opera "His Majesty," and the select choir of mixed voices gave a finished interpretation of G. A. Macfarren's part-song "The cuckoo sings in the poplar tree," the choral music being directed by Mr. H. R. Eyers.

The students of the operatic class, under the direction of Mr. Betjemann, gave their usual stage performance before the summer holidays on the 20th ult., in the concert-room of the Academy. The work chosen was Mozart's "Don Giovanni," omitting the last act. Decided dramatic talent was shown by Miss Gertrude Drinkwater, as Donna Anna, and Miss Lizzie Austin evinced intelligent appreciation of the character of Zerlina. Mr. Maengwyn Davies and Mr. T. Haigh Jackson sang well as Don Giovanni and Leporello respectively, but the most successful of the male exponents was Mr. Ford Waltham, who appeared as Masetto and made effective use of his fine bass voice. The following evening a performance was given of "The Merchant of Venice." The choice of this play was somewhat peculiar, seeing that there are only three female parts in it, and that the Academy presumably does not possess male students capable of acting. As a consequence all the characters were sustained by ladies, who, it must be admitted, acquitted themselves of their unusual task in a highly creditable manner. Miss Annie M. Child, in particular, showed dramatic intuition as Shylock, and the personations by Miss Clare Butler of Bassanio and Miss Margaret Chatwin of Antonio were intelligent efforts. Portia was embodied with notable elocutionary skill by Miss Ellen Bowick, and Miss Ernestine Handcock was commendably vivacious as Gratiano. Such performances, however, forcibly impress the urgent need at this Institution of an adequate concert-room or theatre.

The competition for the Robert Newman Prize took place on June 26, the Prize being awarded to Eustace Turner (Bromley, Kent). The examiners highly commended George D. Cunningham.

THE ASSOCIATED BOARD.

The annual general meeting of the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music was held at Marlborough House on the 17th ult., under the presidency of the Prince of Wales. From the report it appeared that in 1897 the candidates entered for the Local Centre Examinations numbered 2,792, as against 2,775 in 1896. Of these 124 took two subjects. In the preliminary examination the failures in the senior grade were 9, as against 18 in 1896, and in the junior 23, as compared with 52. Of the 2,864 candidates who presented themselves at the final examination, 1,175 passed in the senior grade and 452 in the junior, as against 1,168 and 411 in those grades respectively in 1896. Of those who passed, honours were taken by 77 senior and 38 junior candidates, as against 97 and 43 in 1896. The senior medal, presented by the Mayor of Leicester (Mr. J. Herbert Marshall) in commemoration of the Diamond Jubilee of the Queen, was awarded to Miss Gertrude E. Miller, of Pevensey, who obtained the phenomenal distinction of gaining the maximum number of marks for pianoforte playing; and the junior medal to Miss Margaret C. Worth, Plymouth, who obtained 147 marks out of 150 for pianoforte playing, and 125 out of 150 for violin playing. Mr. Marshall also presented two silver medals to the best candidates in his own centre, which were won by Miss Eva Bradshaw, for singing, and Mr. Shirley North, jun., violin. The gold medal annually given by Messrs. Holder Brothers, of Hull, was awarded to Mr. William Hodge, who obtained in the senior grade an honours certificate in harmony, in addition to a certificate for pianoforte playing.

In the evening the Associated Board gave its annual dinner at the Hôtel Métropole, Mr. T. Threlfall (the Chairman of the Board) presiding. In proposing "Success to the Associated Board," Mr. J. W. Sidebotham, M.P., said he was glad to know that what had been done was highly appreciated in England, and that soon the examinations would be extended to the Colonies. One point must never be lost sight of, and that was to maintain the high character of the examination which they set for pupils.

The Chairman, in response, spoke of the devotion and zeal of the late Lord Charles Bruce, his predecessor. The alliance of the chartered bodies was doing a great work for musical education, and he hoped that their union would be more and more cemented in the future. Their work was progressive in character, and there were many indications in the direction of the extension of its field of usefulness, especially at the Cape, in Australia, British Columbia, New Zealand, Canada, and Gibraltar. In order to promote yet further the study of music, the Board had resolved to offer two free exhibitions for the scholars who had passed with honours at the recent examinations.

Other toasts were proposed and responded to by Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Dr. Hubert Parry, Mr. C. Morley, M.P., the Mayor of Leicester (Mr. J. H. Marshall), Canon Ryan (Thurles), Judge Meadows White, Q.C., Mr. Marcus Stone, and Mr. Forbes Robertson.

The Associated Board will give two exhibitions in 1898, each tenable for two years, one for pianoforte at the Royal Academy of Music, and one for singing at the Royal College of Music. Examinations will be held at the University of Adelaide in November. Mr. C. Lee Williams has been appointed examiner, and he will also conduct examinations for the Board in other parts of Australia, in Tasmania, New Zealand, Vancouver, and probably Canada.

TONIC SOL-FA FESTIVAL.

This annual gathering is generally one of the most interesting events of the summer season at the Crystal Palace, and that on the 17th ult. proved no exception to the rule. Juvenile and adult singers each gave a lengthy concert, and between them was a "Great Welsh Festival." This description was somewhat misleading, as, although the majority of the 3,000 executants came from several quarters of the Principality, the programme entirely consisted of works by Dr. Joseph Parry, an able musician, but not the only Welsh composer entitled to be heard on such an occasion. A novelty in this section was a tone-poem called "A Dream," written for two choirs, organ, orchestra, and four brass bands, a combination not more uncommon than the theme of the composition. The first movement, "Night and Sleep," is for orchestra alone, and here Dr. Joseph Parry (who conducted) demonstrates that he has no need to resort to exceptional means for the production of impressive effects. In the second division, "Dream—Visions of Hell," the chorus are employed to deliver "the moans of lost souls," the result of this union with the instrumental forces being scarcely worthy the trouble taken by the performers or the strain upon the attention of the listeners. More satisfactory is the third section, "Dream—Visions of Heaven," in which there is not so much appearance of effort. Chorally the performance was weak, not nearly so good as that of Dr. Parry's male chorus "The Pilgrims," or of the selection from his cantata "Cambria." The 5,000 juveniles, who at an earlier period occupied the Handel orchestra, sang Sir John Stainer's action song "A Soldier's Life," "The United Kingdom" (an arrangement by Mr. A. L. Cowley of national airs), and other pieces, sacred and secular, with remarkable animation and precision. Mr. S. Filmer Rook conducted. At the evening concert both the choral and instrumental pieces were of a more advanced order, and the performance was distinguished by excellent attack, fine tone, and general precision. In fact, we have rarely heard a better choir on the Crystal Palace orchestra. One of the most successful pieces in the programme was "Judge me, O God." Mr. L. C. Venables conducted.

NONCONFORMIST CHOIR UNION.

The Nonconformist Choir Union held its ninth annual festival at the Crystal Palace on June 26, under the conductorship of Mr. E. Minshall. The choir of about 4,000 voices represented nearly forty London and suburban and upwards of a hundred provincial societies, Yorkshire and Lancashire sending very large contingents. As a whole the singing was scarcely so commendable as usual, there being several instances of hesitancy of attack and general uncertainty. Professor Prout's setting of the Hundredth Psalm was among the works deserving closer attention to detail than it received. The soprano solo in this composition, "Be ye sure that the Lord He is God," was excellently sung by Miss Margaret Hoare. The programme also included Mr. J. H. Maunder's telling harvest anthem "While the earth remaineth," Orlando A. Mansfield's Christmas anthem "There shall come forth a star," several secular part-songs (including Arthur Berridge's setting of Edmund Spencer's "Every sweet with sour is tempered"), and orchestral pieces for the Nonconformist Union Band, conducted by Mr. T. R. Croger. In the competition for choirs numbering from twenty-six to forty, the best singing came from the Stacksteads

Wesleyan Choir, which defeated four rivals. On assembling upon the Handel orchestra to receive the prize awarded them by Dr. Turpin, they sang the test piece, Dudley Buck's "Hymn to Music," with admirable precision and impulse. Through lack of sufficient entries the competition for smaller choirs did not take place.

INTERNATIONAL MUSIC TRADES EXHIBITION.

The Exhibition at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, from the 9th to the 20th ult., if not quite so large as its predecessor, contained several interesting features in modern musical manufactures. Two or three of the ancient pianofortes attracted considerable attention, as also did the curious automatic instruments, of which there was a great variety. The series of vocal and instrumental competitions, extending almost throughout the period the exhibition was open, was ably carried through. The three prizes for violin playing were won by Mr. F. C. Topping, Miss E. Wilson, and Miss E. Hunter respectively; whilst at the head of the pianoforte division were Miss E. J. Medd-Hall, Miss E. Wilson, and Miss E. R. Johnson. In solo singing the following were successful: Miss M. Perrott, Miss C. Fuller, and Miss E. Kingsley (sopranos); Miss Florence Venning-Fox, Miss F. A. Hoskins, and Miss Winifred Marwood (contraltos); and Signor G. Maggi, Mr. T. J. Morgan, and Mr. L. R. Bowen (baritones). More attractive were the military band contests, to which two Saturdays were devoted. There was a goodly number of entries for prizes totalling nearly £350, and the judges were Colonel Farquhar Glennie, Captain F. H. Mahony, Lieutenant A. J. Stretton, Mr. C. Hall (2nd Life Guards), and Mr. J. Sommer (Royal Engineers). The maximum number of marks was 400, and the declaration of the prize list, on the 17th ult., showed that the contest was tolerably close. The first prize was gained by the 1st Battalion York and Lancaster (bandmaster, T. W. Wood), with 380 marks. Then came the 1st Battalion South Staffordshire (J. Matthews), 375 marks; 1st Battalion Lancashire Fusiliers (E. M. Rogers), 368 marks; 4th King's Royal Rifles (C. H. Hassell), 367 marks; 2nd Royal Berkshire Regiment (S. Dore), 364 marks; and 6th Dragoon Guards (A. E. Joiner), 360 marks.

The choral competitions were reserved for the 19th ult., when Dr. W. G. McNaught was the adjudicator. There were three divisions—namely, Sunday Schools and Bands of Hope, Day Schools (juniors and not over fifty voices), and adult choirs from twenty-five to fifty mixed voices. In the first-named class, with Franz Abt's "Softly roam, gentle night," as the test piece, the Chapman Road Mission, Victoria Park (conductor, Mr. George Lake), was first, and St. Andrew's, Fulham, Band of Hope (Miss G. Brown), second. Three day schools entered into competition, and Fleet Road, Hampstead (conductor, Mr. Jesse Harris), a choir that has been so frequently prominent in the annual London School Board contests, defeated Monteith Road, North Bow (A. E. Price) and Lauriston Road, South Hackney (W. E. Emerson), the test piece being Dr. McNaught's arrangement of Pearsall's "O, who will o'er the downs." There were also three entries of adult choirs, a very small number under the circumstances. The trial composition was Dr. Roland Rogers's effective setting of "Three fishers went sailing," the winners being the Polytechnic Select Choir (conductor, Mr. G. R. Egerton) and the Peckham Tonic Sol-fa Choir (Mr. T. R. Rayment). The other choir was Tonbridge Wesleyan (Mr. G. J. Kimmins). Dr. McNaught gave some very practical advice to the choirs. The exhibition was brought to a close on the 20th ult. with a concert by prize-winners.

MUSICAL FESTIVAL AT CARNARVON.

The excellent advice given on more than one occasion by English musicians on National Eisteddfod platforms is already bearing fruit. For the first time in the history of festivals of congregational music in the Northern half of the Principality, a full orchestra of about 100 performers was engaged to assist at a festival held by the Calvinistic Methodists of the Arvon division of Carnarvonshire, at the Pavilion, Carnarvon, on the 1st ult. The orchestra included a contingent from Liverpool, under the leadership of Mr. T. Shaw, and the members of the Bangor, Carnarvon, and Portmadoc orchestral bands. The choristers numbered over 5,000, and so great was the interest taken in the celebration that the Pavilion was overcrowded at the evening meeting. Mr. D. Jenkins conducted.

The Methodist Connexion has recently published a new Tune-book, admirably printed by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., from which the festival committee had chosen thirty tunes and chants, together with two anthems, "O love the Lord" (Sullivan) and "See, my soul, the land of brightness" (J. H. Roberts), and two choruses, "Worthy is the Lamb" and "Hallelujah to the Father" (Beethoven), to be rendered at the meetings. The singing during both the afternoon and evening gatherings reached, on the whole, a high level of excellence, and this is the more remarkable as the choristers were unaccustomed to sing to orchestral accompaniment, and no previous united rehearsal had been held. The soprano voices were very fine, the tenor and bass good, but the altos were weak. The rendering of the various hymn-tunes was very effective. There was, however, a lack of that electrical religious fervour which often distinguishes Welsh congregational singing, and also of light and shade in the singing of the minor and lighter tunes. The great choir did not seem to enjoy the chant, which was due to the unsatisfactory printing of the words. The effect of "Worthy is the Lamb" was, however, impressive, and in precision of attack, quality of tone, and heartiness the singing was excellent. The performance of Beethoven's "Hallelujah" was very praiseworthy; the few blemishes which could be detected by the trained ear were comparatively trifling. Mr. J. H. Roberts conducted his own anthem. During the meetings Miss Kate Morgan, of Dowlais (winner of the gold medal at Chicago), also sang. The success of this festival should encourage Welsh musicians to persevere in their efforts to encourage orchestral music, and the next step should be the organisation of a united festival—say, in Carnarvon Castle—where "The Messiah" could be performed by choirs gathered together from all parts of North Wales.

"MORS ET VITA" IN ITALY.

Reference was made in our last number to the first production in Italy of Gounod's sacred trilogy "Mors et Vita," at the Church of the Annunciation at Genoa. The performance, which was an excellent one in every respect and immensely appreciated by a vast audience, was repeated on the following Sunday, with similar results. We subjoin a few extracts from criticisms contained in leading Italian journals:—

The Secolo says: "It was not an ordinary audience merely, but a vast multitude which assembled at the Church of the Annunciation yesterday. Already at Birmingham, where 'Mors et Vita' was first produced, and again at Paris, in the following year, the public had gathered in great numbers to hear it. We question, however, whether on these occasions that monumental work attracted so many-headed and enthusiastic a body of listeners as in the present instance.—The execution of this magnificent work, under the direction of the Maëstro, Del Signore, was highly satisfactory—nay, it may be characterised as truly excellent, seeing that the interpreters were for the greater part amateurs.—At the conclusion of the first part of the oratorio, the enthusiasm of the audience was such that, notwithstanding the sacred character of the place, some spontaneous applause would make itself heard. And it was indeed no easy matter to withhold such a tribute of admiration in presence of so fine an interpretation of the magnificent orchestral epilogue, which embodies, in a masterly manner, the typical melodies occurring in the Requiem, a truly sublime effort of the composer.—The 'Judex,' in the second part, one of the finest numbers in the score, was again most impressively rendered, and shone forth in all its splendour. The same may be said of the 'Judicium Electorum' and the

'Judicium Rejectaneorum,' with which the second part concludes, and in which the baritone, Signor Rolando, was heard to the greatest advantage, particularly in the majestic phrase 'Et congregabuntur,' which has in it something Michelangelesque; the choruses also in this section were most admirably rendered.—At the conclusion of the oratorio the enthusiasm of the audience was no longer to be restrained and found its expression in heartiest applause, which re-echoed through the church, as though the sacred edifice itself were joining in the general approbation of the master and his praiseworthy interpreters."

Il Cittadino says: "This marvellous music, owing alike to the loftiness of its conception, the exquisite form its composer has given it, and the religious and artistic feeling pervading it, cannot fail to call forth in the hearer sentiments at once religious and poetic, and be a source of the purest æsthetic enjoyment. The first part more especially abounds with beauties, moving contrasts, and passionate accents. A grand effect is produced in the second part by employment of the canto fermo in association with the choral numbers. Most impressive in its suave accents and holy calm is the third part, representing the felicity of the Beatified."

The Caffaro says: "Amongst the most beautiful numbers of the sacred trilogy must be placed the orchestral movement entitled 'Jerusalem cœlestis.' Again, the quartet 'Et absterget Deus,' the celestial chorus with its insistance on the motive of felicity, the haunting effect of the grand chorus 'Ecce tabernaculum,' as well as the final fugue of the 'Hosanna,' are pages which must be described as absolutely sublime."

Il Trovatore says: "The performance of 'Mors et Vita' was an enormous success and was enthusiastically applauded, although it took place in a church. The work had never before been produced in Italy."

CONVENTION OF THE MUSIC TEACHERS' NATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

(From a Special Correspondent.)

The nineteenth annual convention of the Music Teachers' National Association took place in New York, on June 24, 25, 26, 27, and 28, when some fifty concerts, recitals, and lectures were held in the Grand Central Palace. Speaking generally, President H. W. Greene and his associates are to be congratulated on the success of the meeting. Since it was founded at Delaware by Theo. Presser, in 1876, the Music Teachers' National Association has had but two meetings in New York City during its varied and eventful career—in 1885 and this year—and perhaps this fact accounts for the large attendance throughout the week and the unusual interest taken in all the proceedings. Notwithstanding the strong opposition of a minority at the meeting for the election of officers on the last day of the convention, it was decided that New York should again be the scene of the convention next year. President Greene was re-elected, and it is to be hoped that under his vigorous leadership some method may be devised that will interest the thousands of musicians in the United States who have for years ignored this association to such an extent as to threaten its very existence.

It was a disappointment to the large number attending the opening meeting that Mr. Dudley Buck, owing to illness, was unable to conduct his "Marmion" overture, which, however, received a satisfactory rendering by the Permanent Metropolitan Orchestra, under the direction of Adolf Neuendorf. Following Mr. Buck's overture were speeches by Professor Hooper, of the Brooklyn Institute, President Greene, and others. Miss Marguerite Hall sang two songs written for her by the late A. Goring Thomas, and the morning session ended with Mr. Hadley's "Festival" march. The afternoon was devoted to a conference on public school music and popular sight reading, and pianoforte recitals by Miss Florence Terrell, pupil of Mr. Alexander Lambert; a song recital by Miss Effie Stewart, assisted by Mr. Richard Arnold, violinist; and an excellent concert by the Cantata Club, of Brooklyn, under the direction of Mr. Gérard-Thiers. The discussion on sight reading was opened by Mr. Waite, and papers were read by Mr. John Tagg, Mr. H. E. Holt, and Mr. J. Zobansky, an advocate of the Gallin-Chevé method. A "concert steriopticon lecture," delivered by Mr. Silas G. Pratt, and a lecture on "Visible Music" drew large attendances in the evening, and the day's doings concluded with a reception at the Murray Hill Hotel, where Miss Laura Sedgwick Collins discharged the duties of hostess, assisted by Miss Amy Fay, Miss Marguerite Hall, and others.

Among the fixtures for the second day may be mentioned an interesting lecture on a "Theory of Interpretation," by Mr. W. Sherwood; a lecture-recital on the Janko keyboard, by Madame Pupin; song recitals by Mrs. Blackmore, jun.; and a lecture on the "Basis of a Musical Touch in Pianoforte Playing," by Mr. Albert Ross Parsons, who defined the various touches employed by the pianist and admirably analysed tone and technique.

One of the most interesting papers read during the day was that on the training of choirboys, by Mr. Walter Henry Hall, organist and choirmaster of St. James's Church, New York. To illustrate his principles of tone production Mr. Hall had on the platform some dozen or fifteen of his choirboys, who sang exercises and anthems in such a manner as to elicit hearty applause from the large audience gathered to hear the latest ideas on the subject of tone production. Mr. Hall is an enthusiastic believer in that method of training which develops the "thin" or "head" as distinguished from the "thick" or "chest" register, and made a plea for more attention to be given to this important branch of a choirmaster's duties. The speaker also remarked upon, and deprecated, the temptation to a conscientious organist to give the "flesh-pots" of ear-tickling, sentimental novelties to the congregation instead of the "manna" of true standard works, and could see no reason why the emotional in our nature should not be appealed to through the music of the Church. The blemishes of sensational and mechanical organ playing were also commented on, and the speaker concluded by pointing out the great opportunities and responsibilities of choirmasters, and exhorted them to the adoption of the highest and best standards, and so, through their own example and influence, to influence the generations to come.

A "grand orchestral concert" was the evening attraction, and special mention must be made of Mr. Harry Rowe Shelley's new Symphony in E flat, the first of his instrumental compositions of such magnitude. This is a work of original ideas, although the influence of his master, Dvorák, and Beethoven, and a little of Wagner may be traced.

Saturday morning was given up to a Virgil Piano recital, a pianoforte recital by Mr. William H. Sherwood, a song recital by Mrs. Gerrit Smith, and a conference on "Musical Journalism," under the chairmanship of Mr. Louis C. Elson. Several replies were received to the questions contained in the circular issued by Mr. Elson in anticipation of the convention, and dealt with the subjects mostly in a general and more or less inconclusive manner. In respect of the third question, as to the possibility of training the critic professionally, the answers were nearly all in the negative. That of Mr. Marc A. Blumenberg raised the important preliminary question as to how it would be possible to fix a standard of criticism in the United States, and no other writer in any way dealt with this point. Mr. Elson, in his address on the subject of musical journalism, among other thoughtful remarks pointed out that the critic should himself select the concerts which he reviewed, and should be able to hold himself free from the influence of the advertising department—that he should hold to his own ideal and lead the public. He also referred to the mutability of an absolute standard of criticism from one period of time to another.

Special musical services occurred in several churches the following day, Sunday. These were arranged under the auspices of the American Guild of Organists. Among those who prepared special music were Mr. William C. Carl, Mr. Chas. H. Morse, Dr. Gerrit Smith, Mr. Everett E. Truette, Mr. W. H. Hall, Mr. W. R. Hedden, Mr. E. M. Bowman, and Mr. Leo Koffler.

The final important concert of the convention was held on Monday evening, June 28, the performance being Mendelssohn's "Elijah," rendered by the Brooklyn Oratorio Society (augmented by members of New York societies), under the direction of Mr. Walter Henry Hall. There was a full orchestra and organ accompaniment, and the soloists were Miss Eleanore Meredith (soprano), Miss F. Roselle (contralto), Mr. Van Yorx (tenor), and Mr. Ericsson Bushnell (bass). Mr. Robert Gaylor presided at the organ. This performance drew by far the largest audience of the week, the spacious auditorium being filled with an enthusiastic crowd of music-lovers.

An important feature of the convention was the Trade Exhibition, comprising displays by leading publishing houses and manufacturers of pianofortes. Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. were prominent with a large selection of their publications bearing on subjects especially interesting to music teachers, who appeared fully to appreciate the opportunity of making themselves acquainted with the valuable educational works of this firm.

REVIEWS.

Novello's Parish Choir Book. Nos. 311—324.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The numerous recent issues in this series indicate that the demand for Service music does not diminish. Nos. 311, 312, and 313, a Te Deum in E flat, another in C, and a Jubilate in C, all three by Dr. E. T. Chipp, are written pretty much on the same lines as the Canticles noticed in our previous issue. No. 314 consists of a Benedictus qui venit and Agnus Dei, by C. J. B. Meacham (for use with Dr. Dykes's Communion Service in F). The music, smooth and flowing, is written with skill and judgment. No. 315 contains a Cantate Domino and Deus Misereatur in D, by Sir George Elvey. The Cantate is rather a long number, but it is bright and in a way varied, though perhaps it does not contain quite enough modulation to satisfy modern ears. The same may be said of the Deus Misereatur, which, however, is shorter. No. 316, a Benedictus for solo voices or semi-chorus, by J. Baptiste Calkin, is somewhat light in style, but fairly pleasing. No. 317, Benedictus (to follow the Thanksgiving Te Deum) in D, by Sir John Goss, is a composition in which there is skill, dignity, and feeling. No. 318, Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D, by Charles Macpherson, are interesting compositions. The voice parts are fairly simple. The well written organ accompaniment is bold and striking; in the pp. passage, "and Holy is His Name," the chords are distinctly impressive. In the Nunc dimittis at the close there is a well-considered reference to the "He hath shewed strength" section of the Magnificat. The music of No. 319, Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, by T. Tallis Trimnell, is quiet and expressive. The close of the Nunc dimittis seems somewhat weakened by the chromatic harmonies of the accompaniment; the contrary motion of the bass is, however, a redeeming feature. No. 320 is a plain monotone setting of the Apostles' Creed, by J. H. Cornell, supported by an effective organ accompaniment. No. 321, a simple and dignified setting of the Creed, by E. G. Monk, is a re-issue. No. 322, Benedictus in G, by James Turle, is in chant form. Nos. 323 and 324 are "Twelve Popular Hymns," by A. H. Mann. All the simple, melodious tunes of these two sets bear the name of some ancient Greek writer on music—Pythagoras, Euclid, &c., with, so far as is known, date and place birth. In adopting this curious plan the composer of the tunes had a double object in view: to induce "some few to look into musical histories and see what these great men did, and also to give other composers the wherewithal to distinguish their tunes.

The Glory of the Lord. By Charles Darnton.
[Nonconformist Musical Journal Office.]

This is a "prize anthem," and presumably the best of many competitive works. The constraint which is rarely absent when writing under such conditions is at times manifest in Mr. Darnton's composition, but it will be found suitable where vocal capacities are limited, and it provides sufficient variety of treatment to maintain the singers' interest.

How to Listen to Music. Hints and suggestions to untaught lovers of the art. By H. E. Krehbiel.
[John Murray.]

Most collectors of books on musical subjects possess a copy of the little volume by Fétis, entitled "La musique mise à la portée de tout le monde," which, published as long ago as 1830, was speedily translated into half-a-dozen languages, and must have enormously helped in spreading musical enlightenment throughout the Western world. Fétis also designed his volume specially for "untaught lovers of the art," and accomplished his task so well that his book is still read with pleasure and profit by those to whom it was addressed. So many things have happened to music since 1830, however, that it was time a work of the kind on more modern lines should appear, and we are glad this has been undertaken by so competent a writer as Mr. Krehbiel, who, as one of the best equipped and most gifted of American critics, has long ago won the esteem of his English colleagues. "How to listen to Music" will certainly prove a boon to many whose knowledge, falling short of their enthusiasm, is often unequal to the task of justly estimating the works and performances placed before them. It takes for granted, however, a very considerable amount of general culture among its readers. Mr. Krehbiel has not catered for the proverbial "man in the street"—otherwise, "l'homme sensuel moyen"—he speaks to ladies and gentlemen for whom musical notation has no longer any mysteries; who understand such expressions as "superfluous seconds" (we should have written "augmented"—but that is a detail); know what is implied by the terms "rhythm," "pitch," "time," and so on; and are accustomed to the language employed in high-class magazines by writers treating of artistic or scientific subjects. To these he chats pleasantly and fluently of the various branches of the art with which his book deals, such as the opera, the orchestral symphony and its companion forms, the concerto, overture, suite, and symphonic poem; the oratorio, cantata, madrigal, glee, part-song, &c.; and chamber music. Chapters are devoted to a discussion of the limits and scope of music as a language of emotion and as the expression of ideas; to a definition and justification of criticism, and an examination of the relations between musician, critic, and public; and to a description (with plates) of the principal orchestral instruments. In a work of this kind it is less important that what is said should be new than that it should be sound. We have read Mr. Krehbiel's volume with some care, and have pleasure in affirming that his views are as sane and as free from bias as could possibly be wished, and that the technical information conveyed is accurate goes without saying.

Novello's Octavo Anthems. Nos. 561-567.

The recent additions to this most useful series of Church music fully maintain the high standard which has so long distinguished this publication. "Praise the Lord, ye servants" (No. 561), is a re-issue of Mr. Maude Crament's admirable thanksgiving anthem, and the fact of its republication is sufficient proof of the merits of Mr. Crament's composition having been widely appreciated. "Sing, O Heavens" (No. 562), composed by H. Davan Wetton, is an anthem for festal occasions, and would be admirably appropriate for the forthcoming harvest thanksgivings. It opens and closes with a chorus in triple measure, which possesses attractive rhythmic force, and the intervening sections, in which provision is made for solo voices, are equally attractive. No. 563 is an interesting addition to this valuable series. The music is by Franz Schubert, adapted by F. A. W. Docker to the English text written by the Rev. Benjamin Webb. It opens with a bass solo of dignified character, the melody of which is subsequently harmonised for a four-part chorus, and in its entirety the work is a good specimen of its composer's style in this class of composition. "My heart is inditing of a good matter" (No. 564), by Myles B. Foster, is stated to have been written "to commemorate Her Majesty's reign," but it is a work suitable for all church festivals. It is set out for soprano solo, orchestra, and organ, and is conceived in a spirit of thanksgiving and praise. The solo extends over some three pages and affords a good singer opportunities for impressive declamation. The choral portions are well balanced, and a fugal passage gives dignity to the close of the work. "Let the righteous be glad" (No. 565), by Richard Francis Lloyd, may be recommended to choirmasters in search of an effective "full anthem," of a bright and vigorous kind and moderate difficulty. No. 566 is the prayer "Lord of life," from Sir Alexander Mackenzie's "Jubilee Ode," one of the most successful portions of that work. "Be thou exalted" (No. 567), by Clowes Bayley, provides an effective anthem for soprano solo and choir suitable for ordinary occasions.

Six Lyrics from Elizabethan Song-books. Six Modern Lyrics. Set as part-songs by C. Hubert H. Parry. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

It may truly be said that the unique store of English part-music is enriched by the above two volumes. The first one contains settings for soprano, alto, tenor, and bass of "Follow your Saint" (Campion), "Love is a sickness" (Samuel Daniel), "Turn all thy thoughts to eyes" (T. Campion), "Whether men do laugh or weep," and "The sea hath many a thousand sands," the words of the two last-named being taken "from an Elizabethan song-book," a source from which is derived the text of the sixth of this series, "Tell me, O love," the music of which is written in six parts. The title, "part-songs," "a melody sung by soprano voices and harmonised by altos, tenors and basses," hardly expresses the distinctive type of the music, as each voice part possesses considerable independence and musical interest. The most striking features in the settings, however, are the perfect accord between the verbal accentuation and that of the music, and the happy manner in which the latter reflects the spirit of the words. The naïveté and quaintness of the text are thus most effectively illustrated, and at times with genuinely humorous results. The opening portion of "Tell me, O Love," is set in the form of a dialogue between the female and male voices, and the wooing and denying and ultimate reconciliation are set forth with fascinating vivacity and expressiveness.

The "Six Modern Lyrics" possess no less charm and musical interest. The first is a setting of Thomas Moore's "How sweet the answer Echo makes," the opening of which at once attracts attention by the easy flow of the part-writing. Two of the lyrics, "Since thou, O fondest," and "What voice of gladness," are by Robert Bridges, and in each case the music is worthy of the poet. From Coleridge Dr. Parry has taken "If I had but two little wings," and treated it with the utmost daintiness and delicacy. The strains allied to Shelley's "Music, when soft voices die," are of great beauty, and the parts entwine with graceful freedom and sweet harmony in perfect consonance with the placid melancholy of the poet's lines. The finest effort of this series is the setting of the 123rd canto of Tennyson's "In Memoriam," the lines chosen beginning "There rolls the deep." This was written as a tribute to the memory of the late Lord Leighton, and no more worthy "remembrance" has been contributed by one artist to another. The music is lofty in conception, dignified in character and deeply expressive, and the exquisite tenderness of the concluding bars is of a nature that is apt to prompt "the tears of bearded men."

The Orpheus. New Series. Nos. 300-304. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Part-singing by male-voice choirs was once as popular in England as it is now in France and Germany, but it fell into desuetude, though there are now unmistakable signs of a revival of interest in this form of musical art. Choirs of all sorts will re-assemble in less than two months, and attention may therefore now be drawn to a particularly attractive series of numbers of a publication that has won widespread favour. We have here to deal with music chiefly of a lively and humorous description. The first on the list is "A Hunting Song," by Edward Piers, master of the choristers of St. Paul's Cathedral in 1600. The words are very quaint and fanciful, and the music is quite as clever and fanciful as Weelkes's celebrated "Nightingale." More in its favour could not be said. No. 301 is "The Hunt is up," by John Bennet. This wonderfully effective piece, written for voices in four parts, is worthy of attention from conductors in all quarters. A most amusing piece is No. 302, "When the cock begins to crow," by Henry Purcell. The humorous verses could not have been set, for three voices, in a manner more provocative of laughter. Then we have a modern piece, "Two Snails," by that master of humour in part-music, Sir Frederick Bridge. One snail is English and the other French, and they make love to each other by means of the telephone. The words, reprinted from "Little Folks," are set in the most musicianly manner, and the suggestions of French and English patriotic ditties are very funny. No. 304, the last for the present, is of a very different character. "Shall I look to ease my grief," by C. Harford Lloyd, words from Robert Jones's "Ultimum vale" (1608), is tragic and deeply sentimental, the music being for four voices, the uppermost, alto, ranging as high as C on the third space. It will well repay study, but should not be attempted in public without careful rehearsal.

Novello's Octavo Edition of Trios for Female Voices. Nos. 308-316. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Some attractive additions have been made to this series. Mr. Hamilton Clarke in "To-day and To-morrow" (No. 308) provides ladies with what may be termed a song of hope which may be sung with advantage when "The sky is dull and dreary." In No. 309 will be found an admirable arrangement for S.S.A., by Dr. McNaught, of Hatton's setting of Mary Cowden Clarke's patriotic lines "England," and patriotism, in a similar arrangement of Hugo Pierson's stirring song "Hurrah for merry England," provides the subject of No. 310. No. 311 is an expressive composition entitled "Frost-bound," by Herbert W. Wareing; much grace distinguishes No. 312, entitled "The wings of sleep," by C. H. Lloyd; and "Night Music," No. 313, also by Herbert Wareing, could scarcely fail to give its listeners pleasure. The same musician supplies No. 314, "A song in Snow-time." This is more simple in character than the two preceding songs, but it is no less charming, and the concluding bars are specially effective. Nos. 315 and 316 are respectively arrangements of "The Queen's Song," by Eaton Faning, and "All hail the glorious reign," by Frederic H. Cowen, both of which as four-part choruses have won widespread favour.

The eyes of all wait upon Thee. By Myles B. Foster. Praise the Lord, O Jerusalem. By J. H. Maunder. New Harvest Anthems. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The above are respectively Nos. 573 and 577 of Messrs. Novello's valuable series of Octavo Anthems. The former is set out for soprano solo and four-part chorus, but the solo portion forms a more integral part of the work than is mostly the case, at times giving out phrases which are afterwards repeated by the choir, and occasionally adding a fifth part to the chorus. This method imparts considerable artistic interest to the anthem, which in other respects will be found attractive and impressive. Mr. Maunder writes with keen appreciation of the requirements and abilities of average church choirs, and his present setting of familiar harvest texts is an excellent example of his melodious and flowing style. It contains a solo section, which could be sung by a soprano, alto, or baritone voice, although it is most suitable to the first-named, and the choruses are stirring, solidly written, and easy to read at sight.

Legend of Bregenz. Ballad for Female Voices. Poem written by Adelaide Proctor. Music composed by Wilfred Bendall. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The poem tells of Bregenz, that "quaint city on the Tyrol shore," saved by the patriotism and courage of a simple maid. The music, principally ensemble, is written in a flowing, pleasing style. The work, moreover, is short and easy, so that it will prove acceptable to conductors of small societies, who select, not according to the ambition, but according to the capabilities of their singers. The "Legend of Bregenz" is a useful stepping-stone to higher things.

No answer. To the absent one. A red, red rose. The dream of youth. How wond'rous fair thou art. Op. 40. Songs by Graham P. Moore. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

These songs are well worthy of the attention of all cultured vocalists. Mr. Moore has gone to various sources for his text, but he has chosen the poems with admirable appreciation of their suitability to musical illustration. "No answer," the words of which are translated from the German of Robert Reinick, may be said to receive a satisfactory reply in Mr. Moore's dainty music. Goethe's "To the absent one" is simply but effectively treated, and the setting of "A red, red rose," more familiarly known as "My luve is like a red, red rose," is worthy to take its place amongst the best of the many songs that Burns's lines have inspired. The text of "The dream of youth" is a translation of some pessimistical verses by Oelbermann, wherein youth is somewhat unnecessarily exhorted to "Dream on." The words of "How wond'rous fair thou art" are also derived from a foreign source, the poet being Strachwitz. It should be added that the vocal compass is that possessed by average soprano and tenor voices, and that the accompaniments are such as may be read at sight by a fairly good pianist.

Edwin Ashdown.—A number of pianoforte pieces recently published by this firm bear agreeable witness to a faith in the prevalence of a refined taste existing among amateur pianists, from which may be recommended the following examples of modern home-music. Scènes de Pantomime, by Oscar Beringer. These are six in number, and are severally entitled "Les Fées," "Pas Seul," "Arlequin," "Pierrette," "Lutin," and "Pierrot." The most attractive of them are the first, second, and third, which are very bright, tuneful, and pleasing little pieces. Moreover, they are easy to play and very effective. ——Three Pieces (Op. 25) by Otto Goldschmidt, late musical director of the Bach Choir, also merit attention. The first of these is a transcription of the composer's song "Widmung," which has been deftly treated. No. 2 is entitled "Im Sommer," and seems to have been inspired by agreeable impressions of its season. No. 3 consists of Variations on a theme by Sebastian Bach, the theme being the opening of the master's "Pastorale" for the organ, in which the composer has treated his subject with effective ingenuity and in a manner consistent with its character.——Three Bagatelles for the pianoforte, by Walter Macfarren, although manifestly written to meet the requirements of those of limited executive abilities, are by no means devoid of musical interest.

Metzler and Co.—Three Sketches for Violin and Pianoforte. By Edward German. These sketches are severally named "Valsette," "Souvenir," and "Bolero," titles which fairly indicate their respective characters. The monotony of the waltz rhythm is cleverly broken in the first-named, while the "Souvenir" is an expressive little piece in six-eight measure. The "Bolero," which possesses considerable brilliancy, would make an effective concert piece.——Berceuse for Violin and Pianoforte. By G. Calamani. Melodiousness and simplicity are its chief characteristics, which may be recommended to players of moderate attainments.——Twelve Little Men of Music-Land. By Clifford Hallé. The secondary title of this volume is "Harmony made easy," and in a brief preface the author says that "the idea grew on a rainy afternoon, when two tiny friends were placed under his charge to be amused." The "twelve little men" are supposed to live within the notes of the octave on the keyboard and to sing when the notes are depressed. The notes are described as the houses of these quaint little "singing-men" and the whole keyboard as a street in which they dwell. This personification is carried farther into their amicable or otherwise relationships to each other, and the system is developed with a lucidity and attractive vivacity well calculated to arouse the interest of juvenile minds and we should think it can hardly fail to impress upon them the underlying facts.——Ave Maria, by Nita Gaëtano Moncrieff, is a melodious and simple setting of the prayer to the Virgin, and is furnished with a violoncello obbligato. The English words are by Paul England.——Laugh not, nor weep, written by Frederick Clay, is a graceful tenor love song which should not be sung by a lady, and Lullaby, words by Tennyson, music by Louise Sington, is a charming little ditty which should not be sung by a gentleman.

Forsyth Brothers.—A series of Duets for Mezzo-Soprano Voices, by Edwin Schultz, are melodious and attractive in character, and of moderate difficulty. Similar in style are Two Duets for Soprano and Tenor, or Baritone, by Nicolai von Wilm.——A dainty little Aubade, by Louis H. Hillier, may be recommended to tenor singers, especially to those whose voices are of light quality.——The Silent Harp and Love's Invocation, by Graham P. Moore, are two pleasing songs.——An arrangement for violin and pianoforte, by Siegfried Jacoby, of a Tambourin and Passepied from Rameau's masterpiece, the opera "Castor et Pollux," which dates from 1737, will doubtless be welcomed by many violinists of antiquarian tastes.

Thou, O God, art praised in Sion. Anthem for men's voices. By Gerard F. Cobb (Charles Woolhouse). Mr. Cobb's anthem follows traditional form and provides solo passages for alto, tenor, and bass, that for the latter being of a suave character and extending over three pages. The parts are well written for the voices and the contrapuntal portions are simple and effective.——Great is the Lord and Marvellous. Anthem for harvest festivals and other occasions. By Frank Adlam (Hart and Co.). This anthem is well suited to church choirs of limited abilities. It comprises solos for soprano or tenor, two quartets, and opening and closing four-part choruses of a diatonic and vigorous character.——I will love Thee. Anthem by R. M. Cadman. This is written in four parts throughout. The music is bright and earnest in expression, and the construction shows appreciation of what is effective.——Unison Hymn Tunes. By George Sampson (Forsyth Brothers). These are intended for "congregational and public school use." Mr. Sampson has invented a capital tune for No. 1, "When skies are clouding," and the series is likely to prove welcome to those for whom it is designed.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

The principal musical event in connection with the local Jubilee festivities consisted of two free concerts given by the Festival Choral Society, under Dr. C. Swinnerton Heap's conductorship, with Mr. C. W. Perkins at the organ. The Town Hall at both concerts was crowded and presented a coup d'œil rarely seen at a musical gathering. The proceedings opened with an organ solo on national airs, followed by the National Anthem, in which the audience joined. The programme also included Faning's "The Queen's Song," Cowen's patriotic part-song "All hail the glorious reign," and Hollingworth's glee "Here's life and health to England's Queen." The soloists were Messrs. S. Roper, Lowe, Cranmer, and Bright.

The customary terminal concerts in connection with the Midland Institute School of Music attracted a large circle of the pupils' friends. The most interesting of these functions was the admirable chamber concert given by the students attending Mr. Max Mossel's classes. The programme opened with an admirable rendering of Schubert's quintet "The Trout" (Op. 114), and concluded with Widor's Serenade (Op. 10) in B flat major for pianoforte, flute, violin, violoncello, and harmonium.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Quickly following the termination of our concerts and more public musical demonstrations, with the review of progress made or lost during the past winter campaign, come the academic inspections which more rigidly and calmly estimate our position. The University classes have been unusually successful; the union existing between the Owens College and the Royal Manchester College of Music tending to the advantage of both Institutions, and enabling Dr. Hiles, who controls the composition department therein, to carry out a larger and more comprehensive scheme than would otherwise be possible, ensuring the attainment of high executive skill and acquaintance with practical modern art by the University graduates, and the thorough versing in the grammar and construction of music of the students in the College in Ducie Street. On Saturday, the 3rd ult., the Vice-Chancellor conferred the degree of Mus.B. upon two students who had not only completed their three years' course, but had also satisfied the examiners by the "Exercises" submitted. Several others have finished their studies in the Owens College classes, but have yet to send in the motets whereby their originative talent may be tested; and it is understood that the examinations of the junior undergraduates of the first and second years show a marked advance, exciting bright hopes of a gradually increasing attainment. At the College of Music the Principal, Mr. Brodsky, has every reason for gratulation. Four evenings have been devoted to the public demonstration of the success of the work of the year. The annual festival week of the College always excites a wide and eager attention, and this year the orchestral rendering (under the direction of the Principal) of the Brahms Symphony (No. 2) and of the "Leonora" Overture (No. 3), and the performance of the first Act of Mozart's "Il Flauto magico" by the operatic class, afforded convincing evidence of the general excellence of the talent and discipline of the Institution. On the succeeding evenings the programmes were devoted to the more miscellaneous display of the acquirements of smaller groups of executants. Specially should be noticed the ensemble playing by members of Mr. Carl Fuchs' classes in selections from the chamber work of Brahms, Schumann, Beethoven, Dvorák, and others; the pianoforte solo performances of some of the more advanced pupils of Miss Olga Néruda and Mr. Dayas; and the finished playing of two or three of those young people who enjoy the advantage of being under the direct care of Mr. Brodsky. The work of the choir was very light, but satisfactory; and more stress would, doubtless, have been made upon it, as well as upon the capable organ students, except for the difficulty of finding room within four evenings for all the students entitled to come forward. The week following the public examination, was devoted to strict private inspection of the year's progress; and the professors separate for the long vacation with well-earned satisfaction with the results of their labours and ample demonstration of the public confidence. During the interval before the resuming of study, a third organ of greater capability is to be placed in the charming little concert-room, the gift of Mrs. Charles Lees, the widow of the gentleman who munificently secured and furnished the building. In September the staff of professors of vocal art will be joined by Mrs. Hutchinson and Mr. Ford, in place of Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, who is retiring.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

Performances at the Opéra have been confined during the last few weeks to works long on the répertoire—to wit, M. Reyer's "Sigurd," M. Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila," "Lohengrin," "Les Huguenots," and others, with modifications in the cast now and then on account of some of the singers taking their holidays. A gratuitous performance was given, as usual, on the 14th ult., the work chosen being "Don Giovanni," which was immensely successful. There is, in the opinion of operatic artists, no audience like the one assembled on these occasions for bestowing hearty and vociferous applause. M. Raynal, a robust tenor, has been engaged at this Institution.

At the Opéra Comique, owing to the illness of the conductor, M. Daubé, the performance of the new works now in preparation will have to be delayed until next season, when also M. Massenet's "Sapho" is to be brought out. The libretto of the latter, from the pen of MM. Henri Cain and Bernède, is founded upon M. Daudet's novel of the same name, and Madame Calvé is to create the title part. That lady, who is just now taking a rest at Carlsbad, has signed an engagement at the Opéra Comique for six months. "Louise," a new work by M. Charpentier, has been accepted for performance by M. Carvalho. Owing to the delicate health to which M. Daubé has been subject for some time past, the management have appointed an assistant-conductor in the person of M. Alexandre Luigini, hitherto conductor at the theatre in Lyons, a very able musician. An engagement has also been entered into at this house with Mdlle. de Lafond.

The musical world in this capital having been greatly put about by the news of the discontinuance of the Lamoureux Concerts, and many erroneous reports having been spread on the subject by persons pretending to be well-informed, it may be as well to state the actual facts, which are these: In the first place, M. Lamoureux does not yet himself know what turn matters may take. It is his hope to find himself, by the time the great Exhibition of the year 1900 is to be held, at the head of a theatre where "Der Ring des Nibelungen" and others of Wagner's works are to be produced. Hence it will be necessary for him to have greater liberty for some time to come, in order to make the needful preparations for the undertaking, to pay prolonged visits to Germany for the engagement of interpreters of the highest order, &c. But it is equally important to him to keep together his famous orchestra, with whom he, moreover, desires to give a series of concerts periodically at London and at Berlin. No doubt a way will be found to reconcile these conflicting personal interests, but as yet no one knows how matters will be arranged.

"Les Erynnies," of Leconte de Lisle, with Massenet's music, is to be produced at the Théâtre d'Orange, to be followed by "Antigone," with music by Saint-Saëns. The last-named composer is engaged, with M. Louis Gallet as librettist, in the elaboration of a work retracing the history of the nineteenth century, with a view to its performance at the coming World's Exhibition.

The first Grand Prix de Rome has just been awarded to M. d'Olonne, pupil of MM. Massenet and Lenepveu, while the second prize has gone to M. Crose Spinelli, and what is called here the deuxième second Grand Prix to M. Schmitt.

The violoncello of the late much regretted M. Jacquard, a Bergonzi well-known to connoisseurs, has recently been sold by auction for the sum of 9,650 francs.

A highly eulogistic essay on Gounod, from the pen of M. Saint-Saëns, is being published in the Revue de Paris.

The ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the extension of the Guildhall School of Music took place on the 21st ult. The new building will have a frontage to John Carpenter Street of seventy-two feet six inches, and a depth of about fifty-one feet six inches, the area of the entire site being about 3,700 feet. The accommodation will include a handsome and commodious concert-room and theatre on the ground floor, capable of seating about 700 people. On the second, third, and fourth floors there will be thirty class-rooms in all. In order to connect the new building with the old, it will be necessary to utilize three of the existing class-rooms, so that the net gain will be twenty-seven. Previous to the ceremony the orchestra and the choir of the school performed, under the direction of the Principal, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mendelssohn's Wedding March, "Midsummer Night's Dream," and "God bless the Prince of Wales." Mr. Pearse Morrison (chairman of the Music Committee of the City Corporation), who laid the foundation stone of the present building in 1885, then laid the foundation of the new wing. After a special prayer offered by the Rev. Prebendary Whittington, an ode, composed by Mr. Cummings to words written by Miss Florence Attenborough and dedicated to Mr. Morrison, was performed. The proceedings concluded with the National Anthem. The operatic students of the Guildhall School of Music performed Flotow's opera "Martha," at the Lyceum Theatre, on the afternoon of the 5th ult., under the direction of the Principal, Mr. W. H. Cummings.

Some interesting competitions in choral singing have been held at the Earl's Court Exhibition, Dr. McNaught having been the adjudicator. On June 24 the competition was confined to female-voice choirs consisting of thirty to seventy voices; the first place was gained by Mr. F. E. Fletcher's choral class at Folkestone, and the second position acquired by the Swansea ladies' choir, conducted by Mr. J. A. Davies, the test piece being "The Nightingale," by Weelkes, as arranged by H. Leslie. On the 3rd ult. elementary school choirs of not more than seventy voices competed. The test was J. L. Hatton's "Jack Frost," the two most successful being the Haselrigge Road Board School, Clapham, under the direction of Mr. T. G. Ball, and the Talke National School Choir, Staffordshire, conducted by Mr. J. Whewall. The most interesting competition of the series, however, took place on the 7th ult., when mixed choirs of fifty to ninety voices competed in the rendering of "A Lover's Counsel," by F. H. Cowen. The first place was gained on this occasion by the Wellingborough Town Choir, conducted by Mr. J. T. Lewis; second, Coleford Philharmonic Society, Gloucestershire; and the third, by the Hanley Choir. It is doubtful if finer choral singing has ever been heard in London than that given by these three choirs, and in point of respective excellence there was little to choose between them. The interpretations on this occasion gave, indeed, satisfactory proof of a far higher standard of efficiency prevailing in many places than might reasonably be expected.

The London Sunday School Choir—by far the oldest of the associations for promoting and improving part-singing among religious workers—celebrated its twenty-fifth annual festival at the Crystal Palace, on June 30, with the accustomed success. The junior and the adult concerts in equal degree passed off satisfactorily. Early in the afternoon over 5,000 children, conducted by Mr. J. Rowley, went through a programme of sacred and secular pieces steadily and with spirit. The rendering in unison of "O rest in the Lord" (from "Elijah") was so neat as to almost excuse the novel manner in which this gem was presented to the audience. George Shinn's "At the Lord's command" and T. Mee Pattison's "Sweet is the murmur" also went well. Later nearly 4,000 adults were heard in oratorio choruses, anthems, and part-songs. The choral "Sleepers, wake" (from "St. Paul"), Dr. E. Bunnett's Magnificat in F, Merritt's anthem "Lift up your hearts," David M. Davis's anthem "The king shall rejoice" and the "Hallelujah" chorus (from "The Messiah") were among the works in which this efficient body testified to watchfulness of the baton of Mr. George Merritt, who displayed every qualification for his onerous office. The accompaniments were played by the Crystal Palace band, the orchestra of the choir, and the organ.

The National Temperance Choral Union Festival at the Crystal Palace, on the 13th ult., included choral contests, besides a couple of concerts, each employing about 5,000 voices, on the Handel orchestra. In the first competition (choirs of from twenty to forty voices) Messrs. George Merritt and Frederick Stone awarded the prize to the Clapton Park Sunday School Band of Hope choir, of which Mr. J. H. Parish is the conductor. Of the other contests Sir Frederick Bridge was the adjudicator. In that for choirs of from forty to sixty voices the Barry Temperance (conductor, Mr. J. P. Hicks) proved the winner, whilst in that for choirs of from sixty to a hundred the Nottingham Tabernacle Temperance (conductor, Mr. W. Riley) was declared first, the Cardiff Blue Ribbon second, and the Reading Temperance Choral Society third. Mr. W. G. W. Goodworth was the conductor of the concerts, and Mr. F. Wilson Parrish presided at the organ. At the first concert J. F. Seward's "Song of the Gipsies" and Herbert West's "Our Festal Day," both creditably sung, were specially well received. The temperance prize ode, "Let the music flow," words by F. A. Carter, music by Thomas Merton Clark, was sung at each of the concerts amid hearty approval.

The Hereford Musical Festival will take place on September 14, 15, 16, and 17, with a grand opening service in the Cathedral on Sunday, the 12th, when a new Te Deum and Benedictus, by E. Elgar, will be sung. On Tuesday morning the Coronation anthem, "Hymn of Thanksgiving" (C. H. Lloyd); "The Heavens declare" (C. Saint-Saëns), and "Hymn of Praise" will be performed, and in the evening a concert will be given in the Shire Hall. On Wednesday morning, "A Stronghold Sure" (Bach), Magnificat (Dr. Hubert Parry), a selection from "Parsifal" (Wagner), and the "Last Judgment" (Spohr); the evening will be devoted to Mendelssohn's "Elijah." Thursday morning, the Mass in D (Beethoven), Symphony in B minor (Tschaïkowsky), and "Creation" (Part I.); Gounod's "Redemption" will occupy the evening. "The Messiah" will be given on Friday morning, and the festival will conclude in the evening with a chamber concert in the Shire Hall. The principal vocalists engaged are Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Medora Henson, Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Marie Brema, Miss Jessie King, Miss Marian Blinkhorn, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, Mr. Watkin Mills, Mr. Plunket Greene, and Mr. Daniel Price.

Mr. Ernest Kiver, at a concert at the Salle Erard, on the 8th ult., brought forward several of his ablest pupils, to whom were assigned works calculated to develop their intellectual powers as well as facility of execution. As usual, Mr. Kiver had an unfamiliar composition to offer, which on this occasion took the shape of a Suite in G minor for two pianofortes, by Arensky, not previously performed in London. Smoothly written and containing some extremely melodious passages, it made a good impression, and the rendering it obtained from the Misses Alice G. and Anna Carr was eminently praiseworthy. These young ladies afterwards respectively gave, with good effect, Grieg's Ballade in G minor and Tschaïkowsky's Variations in F (Op. 19, No. 6). Excellent style was displayed by Miss Margaret L. Powell in Mendelssohn's Variations Sérieuses, and Miss Hilda Sykes proved herself equal to most of the requirements of Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor. Several songs were effectively sung by Miss Evelyn Wilkie, whose command of expression was manifested to special advantage in a refined piece by E. K., "If my verses had the wings."

The annual harp concert given by Mr. John Thomas, at St. James's Hall, took place on Saturday afternoon, the 3rd ult. Though not, perhaps, very important from a strictly artistic point of view, it is an agreeable entertainment, the orchestra presenting a pretty spectacle with two dozen white robed young ladies with golden Erard harps before them. A large number of pieces, either original or arranged by Mr. John Thomas, were included in the programme; but there were several vocal numbers, those contributed by the Misses Sofia and Giulia Ravogli being, on the whole, the most appreciated. They were the Serenata from Boito's "Mefistofele" and solos by Gluck and Mascagni. Mr. Dyved Lewis, Miss Clara Williams, Miss Marianne Eissler, Mrs. Mary Davies, Mr. Joseph Hollman, Miss Miriam Timothy, Mr. Emyln Davies, Miss Gwen Davies, and Miss Olive Grey took part in a scheme that was perhaps too long for present day requirements.

Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch gave, on the 21st ult., at the Steinway Hall, an excellent concert of seventeenth and eighteenth century music. As customary at this musician's concerts, the pieces were played upon fine specimens of the old instruments for which they had been written. The programme included two pieces for the virginals, one of them by Thomas Morley; a Fantasie for two viols entitled "The Lady Katherine Audley's Bells," by John Jenkins; Divisions on a Ground for viola-da-gamba, accompanied by the harpsichord, by Christopher Simpson; and some interesting songs, one of which, with lute accompaniment, entitled "Have you seen but a whyte lillie grow," so pleasing the audience that the dainty ditty was repeated. The principal executants were Miss Louise Macpherson, the vocalist; Miss Hélène Dolmetsch, Miss Elodie Dolmetsch, and the concert-giver.

The directors of the Crystal Palace have resolved to alter the arrangements for their orchestral band. As the Palace is, as a rule, now open until ten o'clock in the evening, the entire services of the band have been secured so as to enable the directors to give concerts at more convenient hours than formerly. The mid-day concerts will, therefore, be abolished, and early in September both afternoon and evening concerts will be given, under the direction of Mr. Manns, as heretofore. It is expected that this change will be appreciated by a large number of musical amateurs whose engagements render it impossible for them to attend morning concerts. The forty-second annual series of Saturday concerts will commence on October 9, 1897. There will be eight concerts before Christmas—viz., on October 9, 16, 23, and 30, November 6, 13, 20, and 27.

M. Frederic Bentayoux's second concert at the Salle Erard, which took place on the 9th ult., again consisted entirely of his own compositions, vocal and instrumental. All the solo pieces for pianoforte were performed by himself with the sentiment, spirit, and dash agreeing with the fanciful titles some of them bore. One of the best of these pieces was a nocturne, "La Source et le Torrent," and another effective production was a duet, "Vif Argent," in which Mdlle. L. K. Kornatski shared. Madame de Grandcourt, owing to the unavoidable absence of Mdlle. Casano, sang an air from M. Bentayoux's opera "Katharina," and also gave the "Hymne à la Postérité de la Reine Victoria," securing warm applause for both. The programme was varied by Madame Thénard reciting a couple of humorous pieces.

Mr. Charles Karlyle's concert, in Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 10th ult., introduced to public notice promising young vocalists in Misses Florence H. Cordeaux, Margherita Kowska, and Mary Middleton. The last-named sang a graceful Serenade by Richard Strauss with exceptional taste, and the expressive accompaniment was admirably played by Mr. F. Peachey. Among Mr. Karlyle's contributions were pieces by Handel, Wagner, and Rubinstein, each sung with judgment and scrupulous regard for detail. For her able performance of pianoforte solos Miss Clara Asher deserved all the applause she obtained, her rendering of Chopin's Nocturne in D flat being particularly neat; and Mr. Gerald Walenn distinguished himself as a violinist. Mr. H. Willemsen assisted as accompanist.

M. Léon Delafosse's playing at his recital, on the 6th ult., was distinguished by much charming delicacy and refinement, which made his renderings of Schumann's Nachtstück in F (No. 4), Chopin's Prelude in D flat (No. 15), and a dainty "Romance" by M. Gabriel Fauré very enjoyable; but in impassioned music the reciter's emotions seemed to dominate his intellect, with consequent confused phrasing and noisy fortissimos. M. Delafosse also played a musical accompaniment, written by himself, to Montesquieu's poem "Le Coucher de la Morte," which was recited by Madame Sarah Bernhardt. As in many like endeavours, however, the music proved distracting rather than helpful to the effectiveness of the poem.

Mr. Ernest Fowles may be congratulated on the abilities displayed by his pianoforte pupils on June 29, at the Queen's (Small) Hall. Miss Muriel Nixon's playing in particular was distinguished by musicianly feeling, and Miss Blanche Turner, Miss Lucy Wyatt, and Miss Ethel Garratt respectively showed satisfactory results of careful training in duets with Mr. Fowles. Miss Winifred Jones, Mr. Jasper Sutcliffe, and Mr. Leonard Fowles gave a meritorious interpretation of Jensen's Phantasiestücke for pianoforte, violin, and viola, and Mr. Arthur Walenn sang a new song, entitled "Morituri te Salutant" ("The Gladiator"), by Gerard F. Cobb, and two other lyrics, with his usual success.

M. Marix Loevensohn, a very promising young violoncellist, gave a recital on his chosen instrument on the 7th ult., at the Salle Erard. M. Loevensohn showed considerable command of sympathetic expression in Saint-Saëns's Concerto in A minor (Op. 33), and admirable breadth of phrasing in an aria by Bach, misleadingly described to the audience as "Largo from Concerto, Haydn." Occasionally in difficult passages the reciter's confidence was greater than his executive abilities, but with further study M. Loevensohn should acquire an esteemed position in his profession.

The annual dinner of the R.A.M. Club took place at the Café Monico, on the 22nd ult., under the presidency of Mr. H. R. Eyers. A large number of members and friends assembled and several felicitous speeches were delivered, notably by the President, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Mr. Threlfall, Mr. Walter Macfarren, and Mr. Kuhe. Some admirable part-singing was contributed by Messrs. George May, Vivian Bennetts, James Brand, and Vernon Taylor, whose efforts, especially in Beale's "Come let us join" and Mackenzie's "Franklyn's dogge" were much appreciated by the critically musical audience.

Mr. Willem Coenen, the well-known professor of the pianoforte, has again had signal success with his pupils at the Guildhall School of Music. One of them has obtained the gold medal, and two others have passed with honours in the recent Examination, all three having become Associates. This is the second year in succession that one of Mr. Coenen's pupils has gained the much coveted distinction of the gold medal, which falls to the one student out of the whole school who receives the highest number of marks, the examination being conducted by examiners outside the professorial staff.

At St. Martin's Town Hall, on the 15th ult., the Old Tenisonians' Choral Society, which we understand was formed but a short time back and is connected with Archbishop Tenison's School, gave a selection of well known part-songs, &c., and sang with good taste and expression, under the direction of Mr. David J. Thomas (organist of St. Anselm's, Davies Street). Several experienced artists kindly gave their services, while Miss Annie G. Bennett and Mr. Frank M. Reade were able accompanists at the organ and pianoforte respectively.

In the recent examinations of the students of the faculty of music at Victoria University, Manchester, J. C. Bradshaw, Thomas Keighley, J. M. Potter, H. M. Sheaves, and Catherine Walker passed the second year ordeal; while G. H. Knight and Ethel D. Budge took the final. The exercises having been approved of, G. H. Knight and W. J. Lancaster (who passed his examinations some time back), the candidates, being presented by Dr. Hiles, were admitted by the Vice-Chancellor to the degree of Mus.B. on the 3rd ult.

A successful service was held at All Saints' Church, Blackheath, on Accession Day, when Sir George Martin's Festival Te Deum and Antiphon, the same composer's anthem "O be joyful in the Lord," and his short Festal Evening Service in G were sung. Trumpets, trombones, and drums were used in addition to the organ in accompanying the service, which was sung by the ordinary choir of the church, under the direction of Mr. Herbert Gisby, organist and choirmaster. Mr. Ernest Kiver, late of the Oratory, Brompton, was an efficient organist.

Special Wagner performances, as in previous years, are announced to be given at the Royal Opera, Munich, from the 1st inst. to September 14, when "Der fliegende Holländer," "Rienzi," "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan und Isolde," and "Die Meistersinger" will be alternately produced; while at the Residenz Theatre model performances of Mozart's "Die Entführung aus dem Serail," "Così fan tutte," "Le Nozze di Figaro," and "Don Giovanni" are to be given during the same period.

The following have passed the recent Fellowship examination of the Royal College of Organists: W. Agate (Paisley), C. E. Cover (Leeds), H. Entwistle (Bolton), W. G. Eveleigh (Ayr), E. Harling (Lynton), F. Hill (Aylsham), J. Hirst (Ilkley), T. J. Hoggett (Leeds), C. Johnson (South Cave), P. Jones (Banbury), W. J. Keech (Bedford), A. E. Perry (London), and E. J. Sola (Bournemouth). The diplomas were distributed by Mr. Sedley Taylor on the 17th ult.

The pupils of Mr. Holland's Academy gave a satisfactory concert, on the 9th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall. The most successful vocalists were Mr. J. Johnson and Mr. George Maitland, the former singing in a finished manner the tenor song "Take a pair of sparkling eyes," from Sullivan's comic opera "The Gondoliers," and the latter showing much taste in his rendering of "Love's Nocturne," by Kellie. Miss Rosenstreich also showed promising abilities.

Mr. Alfred Hollins, whose organ recitals have made his name widely known, has been appointed to the important post of organist and choirmaster of Free St. George's Church, Edinburgh.

Sir Frederick Bridge's "Flag of England" is announced to be performed during the coming season by the Liverpool Philharmonic Society (under Mr. F. H. Cowen), by the Exeter Western Counties Association, by the Rochester and Gravesend Choral Societies, at Cheltenham (under Mr. Matthews), and by various societies in the neighbourhood of Manchester. In all probability the work will be repeated at the Royal Albert Hall, under the composer's direction.

Special Thanksgiving Services were held at St. Luke's Church, West Norwood, on Sunday, June 20. At the conclusion of the evening service Costa's arrangement of "God save the Queen" and Handel's Coronation anthem, "Zadok the Priest," were exceedingly well rendered by an augmented choir, accompanied by the organ and a small orchestra. Mr. J. Coleman Young presided at the organ and Mr. Percy S. Bright conducted.

The Fitzner Quartet party gave its third concert on June 29, at the Queen's (Small) Hall, on which occasion Madame Fischer Sobell undertook the pianoforte part in Professor Villiers Stanford's clever Quintet in D minor (Op 25). The other works on the programme were Grieg's characteristic Quartet in G minor and Schubert's Quartet in E flat, the interpretations of these works confirming the good opinions previously formed of these players' capabilities.

Mr. Schulz-Curtius announces another series of Wagner concerts at Queen's Hall, on Tuesday evenings, November 9 and 16, December 7, April 26, and May 17, and Thursday evening, June 16. Four concerts will be conducted by Herr Felix Mottl. Herren Richard Strauss and Felix Weingartner, and, it is hoped, Herr Hermann Levi, will also appear as conductors.

Mr. H. S. Irons, organist and choirmaster of S. Andrew's, Nottingham, has lately been presented with a handsome music cabinet, from past and present members of the choir (on his having completed twenty-one years of work amongst them), in recognition of his exceptional talents, both as composer and executant, and of their gratitude for his unfailing patience, gentleness, and kindness.

During the past month Mr. Edgar Haddock, assisted by Mr. Arthur Ayres at the pianoforte, has continued his series of historical violin recitals at the Salle Erard. The programmes have presented a comprehensive selection of representative works, and those who attended the recitals can scarcely fail to have profited by the educational nature of the scheme.

At the presentation of a loyal and dutiful address to Her Majesty the Queen by the University of Oxford, the Faculty of Music was represented by Professor Sir John Stainer, who was nominated by the Vice-Chancellor and Proctors to act as one of the delegates. The address was read by Lord Salisbury in his robes of office as Chancellor of the University.

Mr. Edward Elgar's effective "Imperial March" was played by the Royal Artillery Band (under Cavaliere L. Zavertal) at the Royal Jubilee Garden Party given by the Queen at Buckingham Palace, on June 28, and also at the State Concert, on the 15th ult., under the direction of Sir Walter Parratt.

Mr. Harold E. Stidolph, of Cape Town (late of Ealing), composed both the music and the words of the National Thanksgiving Hymn which was sung in the cathedrals and many churches on Jubilee Sunday in Her Majesty's South African dominions. The Queen has most graciously accepted a copy of the hymn.

Her Majesty the Queen has conferred the Jubilee Commemoration Medal on Mr. Henry T. Dunkerton, bandmaster of the Scots Guards; Mr. Charles Godfrey, bandmaster of the Royal Horse Guards; and Mr. Rogan, bandmaster of the Coldstream Guards.

The city of Sydney (N.S.W.) has discovered the secret of making organ recitals pay. The annual receipts from the organ performances at the Town Hall are £1,000, and as M. Auguste Wiegand, the city organist, receives a salary of £500, there is an annual profit of £500.

We are surprised to learn from the advertisement columns of one of our daily contemporaries of the 23rd ult. that a new work, "Eliza," is to be performed at the Hereford Festival. The composer's name is not mentioned. Can the work be a coster oratorio?

Mr. Richard Gompertz gave an excellent chamber concert, on June 30, at the Salle Erard. The programme included Tschaïkowsky's attractive Quartet in D (Op. 11) and Brahms's Pianoforte Quintet in F minor (Op. 34), the pianist in the latter work being Miss Adela Verne.

A cricket match was played on the 21st ult., between the choristers of Westminster Abbey and those of All Saints', Margaret Street, with the result that the former, having many runs in their score, were victorious.

Mrs. Garrett, widow of the late Dr. G. M. Garrett, of Cambridge, has been granted a Civil List pension of £50 per annum.

The music library of the late Mr. W. T. Best is shortly to be sold at Liverpool.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Alexandria.—Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine" is about to be produced here by an Egyptian troupe with an Arabic version of the libretto.

Antwerp.—The Conservatoire under the distinguished composer, M. Peter Benoit, is about to obtain its charter as a Royal Institution under the style of "Conservatoire Royal Flamand," and will be in receipt of a subvention from Government. The event is shortly to be celebrated by a grand performance of M. Benoit's fine choral cantata "Schelde."

Barmen.—Professor Anton Krause, for thirty-eight years the conductor of the excellent orchestral and choral concerts in this town, has just retired from this post on account of ill-health. He was at one time a pianist of very considerable reputation, a pupil of Friedrich Wieck, the father of the late Clara Schumann.

Berlin.—Puccini's "La Bohème" was brought out at the new Royal Opera (formerly Kroll's Theatre) on June 22, under Herr Steinmann's direction, and with Frau Herzog and Herr Naval in the principal parts. The performance was an excellent one and there was an appreciative audience, the composer, who was present, being called before the curtain several times. At the West-End Theatre another modern Italian work, Spinelli's "A basso Porto," was produced on the 2nd ult. and achieved a brilliant success. The work is distinctly melodious and highly effective in its concerted numbers. A duet and the prelude to the third act had to be repeated. Frau Moran-Olden and Herr von Lauppert were the leading interpreters, and Capellmeister Wolfheim conducted. Signor Spinelli himself was enthusiastically received by the very numerous audience. Leoncavallo's opera "La Bohème" is in course of being mounted at the Royal Opera.——The Meiningen Orchestra, under the conductorship of Herr Fritz Steinbach, proposes to give a series of concerts here shortly, with Brahms's four symphonies and works by Bach, Beethoven, Schubert, and Wagner in the programme. Professors Joachim and Hausmann, Herr Felix Kraus, of Vienna, and Mr. Eugene d'Albert will be amongst the soloists.——An important new choral work by the Norwegian composer, W. Stenhammar, entitled "Snöfrid," is to be produced by the Philharmonic Choir in the coming season.——An interesting and valuable series of "Lives of the Great Composers" is about to be issued by the newly founded Berlin publishing company "Harmonie." Professor H. Reimann, the eminent organist, will be the editor, and amongst the contributors to the series are Dr. Jadassohn, Dr. Bluthaupt, Professors Gernsheim and L. Auer, Herren Otto Lessmann, A. Niggli, and Wittmann, Capellmeister Volbach, "La Mara," and numerous other distinguished writers.

Bourges.—A monument was unveiled here on June 20, erected to the composer Louis Lacombe, the ceremony including the performance of a prelude and march from the deceased's opera "Winkelried," brought out some three years since at Geneva.

Breslau.—At the little watering-place of Reinerz, where Chopin is said to have given his first public concert, some Polish enthusiasts have lately caused a memorial to be erected commemorating the fact, and bearing a bronze medallion-portrait of the composer.

Brussels.—Musical performances at the Hall of the International Exhibition, the acoustic defects of which have been to some extent ameliorated, were inaugurated officially, on the 15th ult., by a grand concert, under the direction of M. Ysaye, which included Schumann's Symphony in C, the overtures to "Freischütz" and "Tannhäuser," and a much-appreciated rendering, on the part of MM. Ysaye and Thomson, of Bach's Concerto in D for two violins.——A highly-appreciated performance was also given here by the unique orchestra of clarinettists, thirty-seven in number, under the conductorship of M. Poncelet, the well-known professor at the Royal Conservatoire. Mozart's G minor Symphony, the Adagio from Beethoven's "Sonata Pathétique" Weber's "Moto continuo," and a Rhapsody by Liszt were most effectively rendered by this curious ensemble of instrumentalists, whose performance attracted a very numerous audience.——On the 22nd ult. the first performance was announced to take place of M. Tinel's drame musical, "St. Godelive," by some 300 executants, under the direction of the composer.

Caracas.—The capital of Venezuela, which already possesses an Opera-house as well as a Philharmonic Society, chiefly supported by German residents, is about to establish a Conservatoire of Music which will be aided by a Government grant.

Carlsruhe.—The season of opera at the Hof-Theater came to a close on June 13 with a performance, at enhanced prices, of the entire "Nibelungen" tetralogy. Amongst the novelties of the coming season will be a comic opera with the somewhat awkward title "Das Unmöglichste von Allem," by Herr Anton Urspruch, which is also to be brought out at Frankfort and at Weimar.——A number of special performances of opera is announced to take place here, under Herr Mottl's direction, from September 5 to October 3, amongst the works to be produced being Berlioz's "Les Troyens" (both parts), Liszt's "St. Elizabeth" (scenic representation), Wagner's "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan," and "Die Meistersinger," and Beethoven's "Fidelio."

Coburg.—A new three-act opera, "Die Grille" ("The Cricket"), by Herr Johannes Döbber, the Capellmeister of the Court Theatre, the libretto founded upon a story by Georges Sand, is to be shortly brought out both here and at Leipzig.

Frankfort-on-Main.—Herr Humperdinck has undertaken the setting to music of a five-act fairy play, "Schmied Mimer," the author of which is Dr. Otto Weddigen of this town.

Hamburg.—A commemorative tablet has been placed against the house, No. 10, Alsterglacis, inhabited by Hans von Bülow from 1887 until his death, three years ago. The great pianist is also to have his statue erected here.

Hölstein (Switzerland).—A touching and unique occurrence in connection with the recent annual meeting here of neighbouring choral societies was the singing, on the part of a member named Thommen, aged 102, and of his nephew, aged 84, of a chorale; the incident, as may be imagined, creating a most profound impression.

Leipzig.—The members of the Stuttgart Royal Opera, under the direction of Court-capellmeister Obrist, gave a very successful series of representations at the Stadt-Theater last month. Amongst the works produced may be instanced "William Ratcliff," by Signor Mascagni, which was new here, and rather coldly received, although the interpreters were much applauded. The series concluded with an excellent performance of "Mignon."——The seventy-fifth anniversary of the University Choral Society was celebrated by a series of solemnities extending from the 18th to the 22nd ult. It included a concert performance at the Gewandhaus, under the direction of Herr Heinrich Zöllner, of New York (Dr. Kretzschmar, the conductor of the Society, being unfortunately too ill to attend), and another, of sacred music, at the Church of St. Thomas, under the conductorship of Herr Bergelt. Frau Nordewier-Reddingius, of Amsterdam, an excellent oratorio singer, Mdlle. Clotilde Kleeberg, and Herr Georg Lederer, of Zurich, took part.

Malines.—The competition of carillon players, held here last month, was attended by the most complete success, visitors from all parts of Belgium having flocked into the town to assist at the characteristic function. Amongst the nine competitors taking part, M. Van den Plas, of Louvain, obtained the first prize, the second prize being awarded to M. Demette, of Brussels, and the third to M. Denyn, of Malines. A special performance in the evening, given by the latter, who is the official carillonneur of the town, and the singing of a choir from the summit of the tower of Saint Rombaut to the accompaniment of trombones, terminated the somewhat clamorous, but interesting and impressive proceedings.

Mantua.—Signor Mascagni's new Japanese opera, "Iris," was produced here recently at the private theatre of the Marchioness of Guerrieri Gonzaga. Mascagni has accepted an engagement to conduct a series of concerts at Stockholm and Odessa.

Mayence.—At the popular symphony concert of June 25, conducted by Herr Volbach, the overture of a new opera, "Jadwiga," by Herr E. Uhl, was produced for the first time, and, on account of its spirited themes and picturesque instrumentation, achieved a most pronounced success. "Jadwiga" is to be brought out ere long at the Frankfort Stadt-Theater.

Milan.—There is some doubt about the Municipality continuing its annual subvention of some 300,000 lire to the management of La Scala Theatre, an eventuality which would involve the closing of this historic house altogether. Meanwhile the production of opera in Italy proceeds at a great pace. Leoncavallo (to refer to the more prominent composers only) is said to have two works in hand, "Trilby" and "Don Marizio"; Giordano is engaged upon "Fedora," after Sardou's drama, and Mascagni is occupied with a libretto by Signor Illica, the title of which has not yet been finally decided.——Signor Sonzogno is busily preparing a grand autumn season at the Teatro Lirico, when, amongst the works to be produced, are Gluck's "Orphée," Mozart's "Don Giovanni," Leoncavallo's "La Bohème," Mascagni's "Ratcliff," "L'Amico Fritz," and "I Rantzau," Gounod's "Philémon et Baucis," and a number of other operas by French composers.

Mons.—A grand concert was given here last month in honour of M. Jan Blockx, one of the most talented and popular of contemporary Flemish composers, in which fragments were given of his opera "Herbergprinces," successfully brought out last winter at Antwerp. M. Blockx is now engaged upon a new operatic work, entitled "Till Eulenspiegel."

Munich.—The performances of the Royal Opera, which has undergone some important structural alterations during the recess, will re-commence with "Lohengrin," on the 1st inst. Mozart's "Così fan tutte" was revived, on June 25, at the charming little Residenz Theater here, and immensely appreciated by the audience. The work has been most carefully mounted, and is given entirely in accordance with the original score, Mesdames Ternina and Schloss, Herren Walter and Gura having been the excellent representatives of the principal parts. The German libretto has been ably revised by Herr Hermann Levy. Herr Richard Strauss conducted.——Mdlle. Bianca Bianchi, the soprano, once popular at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, was married here last month to Herr Pollini, the well-known Hamburg operatic manager.

Prague.—The one-act opera "Pepita Jimenez," by Señor Albeniz, was brought out at the German Theatre on June 20, and very favourably received, with Fräulein Wiet and Herr Elsner in the principal parts. Mr. Money-Coutts's libretto had been well adapted in German by Herr O. Berggruen. The composer was present and repeatedly called before the curtain.

Rome.—A new mass for two voices with organ accompaniment was produced on June 20, at the Chapel of the American College, and very generally appreciated, the music being in the severe style and of considerable artistic value. The composer is Signor Angelo Tonizzo, one of the censors of the Society of St. Gregory the Great.

St. Petersburg.—Arrangements are being made for the performance in the coming autumn, both here and in Moscow, of German opera, under the direction of Dr.

Loewe, of Breslau, and with Herr Anton Seidl as conductor. Frau Moran-Olden, Herren Perron, Reichmann, and Van Dyck will be amongst the artists taking part.

Turin.—Preparations are going forward for the production next autumn, at the Royal Theatre, of a complete cycle of Wagner's music-dramas. The event is looked forward to with intense interest in many quarters, this being the first undertaking of the kind in Italy, where, it will be remembered, some twenty-five years ago the master's "Lohengrin" (first brought out in Bologna) was received with complete indifference.

Vienna.—Leoncavallo's "La Bohème" is to be brought out at the Imperial Opera, on October 4, the Emperor's birth anniversary, under the direction of Herr Mahler, who assisted at the première of the work in Venice. Mesdames Renard and Mark and M. van Dyck are cast for the leading parts.——The Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde announces the performance during the coming season of the following works—viz., Dvorák's "St. Ludmila," César Franck's "Les Béatitudes" (both for the first time), Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," and Haydn's "The Seasons."——Another Mozart relic has disappeared in the capital, the house at the corner of the Tuchlauben, where, in 1781, the master wrote his "Die Entführung aus dem Serail" (and which for many years bore an inscription to that effect), having just been pulled down.——Herr Alfred Grünfeld, the well-known pianoforte virtuoso, has accepted a professorship for the training of pianoforte teachers at the Conservatorium.

Warsaw.—Special performances were given at the Imperial Theatre last month in commemoration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the death of the popular Polish composer, Stanislas Moniuszko, whose numerous operatic works, "Halka," "Don Quixote," "Loterza," and others still enjoy great vogue in Poland, and whose charming and characteristic songs have become more generally known through their interpretation by Madame Sembrich.

Weimar.—An interesting and successful performance was given on June 20, at the Court Theatre, in aid of the Liszt Memorial Fund, when the symphonic poem "Tasso," by Liszt, and part of the first act and nearly the entire third act of "Parsifal" met with an excellent interpretation under the direction of Herr Stavenhagen. There is no foundation for the rumour of the latter's acceptance of a conductorship at the Munich Opera, in the room of Professor Erdmannsdörfer.

OBITUARY.

We have to record the death, on the 6th ult., in Paris, of Henry Meilhac, the celebrated dramatic writer and librettist, one of the most successful authors of French comedy of the century. For many years in literary partnership with Ludovic Halévy, he was one of the creators of the Offenbachian burlesque opera, the witty and spirited, if distinctly frivolous productions which enjoyed such immense vogue during the second Empire in France and elsewhere, the most notable examples of which were "La belle Hélène," "La Grande Duchesse," and "Barbe Bleu." But Meilhac possessed a versatile genius which could as successfully deal with lyrical comedy of a higher order. His authorship of the librettos of "Carmen" and "Manon," models in their way, furnishes sufficient proof in this direction. He was a native of Paris, received a good education, and started in life as a clerk in a small bookseller's shop, where, in his leisure moments, he drew caricatures for the newspapers. He died in his sixty-seventh year.

Felix Godefroid, the celebrated harpist, died at Villers-sur-Mer, on the 8th ult., at the age of sixty-nine. He was born at Namur in 1818, and commenced his studies at the Paris Conservatoire when only twelve years of age. Godefroid's numerous compositions for his instrument have long been popular with harpists.

Franz Krenn, Capellmeister of the Parochial Church of the Viennese Hofburg, died at Sanct Andræ, in Lower Austria, on June 18, at the advanced age of eighty-two. He was for many years the senior professor of harmony and counterpoint at the Vienna Conservatorium, and greatly esteemed as a composer of church music in Austria, where his numerous compositions, both vocal and instrumental, have long been very generally introduced. He was, moreover, one of the greatest contemporary authorities on the music of the old Italian and Flemish church composers, on which subject he published several valuable monographs.

The death is announced, on June 30, at Machau, in Bohemia, his native town, of Otto Berger, highly gifted violoncellist, formerly of the "Bohemian Quartet," at the premature age of twenty-four. He was a fellow pupil of Joseph Suk, J. Hofmann, and Oscar Nedbal at the Prague Conservatorium, with whom he subsequently founded the "Smetana Quartet," now known as the "Bohemian," which in a short time obtained considerable celebrity, and to which Berger's grand and sympathetic tone and masterly technique not a little contributed.

A composer of some distinction, Adolphe Isaac David, died on June 24, in Paris, after a long illness, aged fifty-five. Amongst his compositions for the lyrical stage, the pantomimes "La Statue du Commandeur" and "Pierrot Surpris" have enjoyed great popularity in Paris and the provinces, and a comic opera, "Diane de Sparre," was likewise well received. He also wrote many pieces for the pianoforte, of which "La Pluie" has become most generally known.

M. Olive Laffont, the popular director of the Opera House at Nice, died on the 14th ult. at Vichy. His professional life extended over more than forty years, he having been at different times the managing director of the theatres of Nantes, Toulouse, Antwerp, and of the Royal Opera at The Hague, and he will with difficulty be replaced in the management of operatic matters at Nice. He was sixty-five years of age.

We have also to record the following deaths:—

On June 15, at Sinalunga, Cavaliere Domenico Pinsuti, composer, brother of Signor Ciro Pinsuti.

On June 18, at Strassburg, Gustav Fischbach, musical author, proprietor of the largest printing establishment in Alsace.

On June 16, at Graz, Dr. Heinrich Merk, Capellmeister of the Royal Opera, Wiesbaden.

On June 20, at Dresden, Albin Bauer, solo flautist at the Royal Opera, aged forty-two.

On June 20, at Madrid, Dr. Letamendi, professor of the medical faculty, composer and musical critic, personal friend and champion in Spain of R. Wagner.

On June 22, at Mittenwald, Ludwig Neuner, one of the most successful modern German violin makers, aged fifty.

On June 22, at Berlin, Theodor Krelle, leading violinist at the Royal Opera, aged thirty-four.

On June 25, at Sesto Calende, Giovanni Bianchi, operatic baritone, formerly of La Scala, Milan.

On the 3rd ult., at Bologna, Giovanni Bolelli, violinist and conductor.

On the 6th ult., at Cremona, Edoardo Guindani, operatic composer, aged forty-three.

On the 8th ult., at Utrecht, Max Mengelberg, violoncellist, brother of the well-known conductor of the Amsterdam Philharmonic Society, aged twenty-one.

On the 10th ult., at Milan, Antonio Melchiori, violinist, composer of ballet music and pianoforte pieces, aged seventy.

On the 11th ult., at Paris, Edouard Stoltz, builder of numerous organs for the French capital and the provinces, aged fifty-five.

The orchestra and chorus engaged at Chester Triennial Musical Festival on the 23rd ult. presented Miss Anna Williams with a gold bracelet, set with opals, in view of her pending retirement from the musical profession. Dr. J. C. Bridge, the conductor, made the presentation, which took place on the Cloister Green, with a few appropriate words, adding that he had never had a more conscientious artist. Miss Anna Williams gracefully acknowledged the compliment.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Your article on "The Art of Applause" recalls a phase in the practice of hand-clapping, of which the oratorio is the long-suffering object. Anyone who attends an oratorio performance, say of "Elijah," at the Albert Hall, will find that some of the numbers are never heard in their absolute entirety without being marred by a din of applause which commences before the piece is really concluded. If the quartet "Cast thy burden" is given with a little extra finish by the vocalists, the closing arpeggio passage is lost in a babel of sound. In "Is not His word," and other numbers in this and various other oratorios, the audience, or at least a portion of the audience, seem determined that the concluding instrumental passages shall be obliterated. One is almost tempted to ask whether people gifted (?) with such an exuberance of hand-clapping go to a performance for the purpose of hearing the solo vocalists or the oratorio.

I am, Sir, yours truly,

July 9, 1897. R. Burns.

[The protest of our correspondent is much to be commended. In "Cast thy burden," not only are the violin arpeggios at the end of the quartet effaced by untimely applause, but the accompanying reminiscence, at the last bar, of the previous solo—

uffers similar treatment.—Ed., M.T.]

MUSICAL SETTINGS OF SEVENTEENTH CENTURY POETS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Will any of your readers kindly tell me of good settings of the following words by seventeenth century poets:—

(1) "My dear and only love I pray," Marquis of Montrose. (2) "To Lucaster on going to the wars," Richard Lovelace. (3) Go, lovely rose!" Edmund Waller. (4) "The glories of our blood and State," James Shirley. (5) Any of the songs from Milton's "Comus." Also any settings of words by (6) Thomas Carew, (7) George Herbert, (8) Crashaw, (9) Massinger, and (10) Ford.

The music may be either by contemporary or modern composers, and written for solo voices or as a part-song.

Plymouth, July 8, 1897. Arthur C. Faull.

[As an instalment of the interesting information required by our correspondent, we venture to suggest the following: (1) Settings by Sullivan and H. K. Rudd. (2) By C. Hubert Parry (third set of English lyrics). (3) By Piatti, and as a madrigal for A.T.T.B., by F. J. Read. (4) C. Hubert Parry. (5) The song "Sweet Eccho, sweetest Nimphe," from Milton's "Comus," set by Henry Lawes, is printed in Hawkins's "History of Music." The remainder of Lawes's "Comus" music is in the British Museum (Add. MSS., 11,518). "List! Lady, be not coy," is set by Pearsall for S.S.A.T.B.B. (6) "Ask me no more" has been set by W. H. Cummings and J. L. Hatton; "He that loves a rosy cheek," by Lionel S. Benson; and "No more shall meads be decked with flowers" ("The Protestation"), by Boyce. (7) "Sweet day, so cool," by Sullivan, and as a four-part song, by F. W. Davenport.—Ed., M.T.]

AMENS TO MINOR HYMN-TUNES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—With reference to your correspondent's letter in The Musical Times of last month on the above topic, may not this have something to do with an unwillingness —I may even say an aversion—which the old composers had to ending a piece with a minor third? The probable reason for this is, that the minor third is not a part of the compound tone of the tonic, and consequently it produces beats with the major third—"the jarring of which is quite perceptible to anyone whose ear is at all trained to analysing sounds. Modern music deals so much more freely with dissonances than did ancient that our ears are far less sensitive to harmonic impurity than the ears of our forefathers; hence we do not feel the ill effect of a final minor chord to the same extent as they did" ("Harmony," by Professor Prout, par. 194).

Faithfully yours,

The Grove, Castleacre, July 14, 1897. Francis G. Highe.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Rev. C. H. D.—There is nothing to show that Attwood composed his "Come, Holy Ghost," for a Coronation service. The earliest trace of the anthem seems to be an advertisement of it in the Musical World, of August 19, 1836. The original title-page runs:—"Come, Holy Ghost, a Hymn for four voices, with an accompaniment for the organ, or pianoforte, composed by Thomas Attwood, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. London: published (for the author) by Jos. Alfred Novello, 69, Dean Street, Soho Square." If the anthem, or, as Attwood modestly called it, the "Hymn," had been written for any particular occasion, the title-page would in all probability have recorded it, according to the custom of the time.

Baritone.—(1) T. S. is the abbreviation of Tasto solo, which is a direction to play the part without accompanying chords—i.e., in unison. (2) "Recit." in Bach's Organ Toccata in D minor (Bridge and Higgs edition, Vol. VI., No. 1) means that the passage is to be played in a Recitative manner, in which rhythmic rigidity gives place to imaginative freedom. (3) To find the number of minutes which a metronomised piece of music takes to perform, proceed thus: divide the metronomic rate by the rhythmic divisions of the bar (2, 3, 4, &c., as the case may be). The result will be the number of bars played in a minute. Divide the number of bars with the quotient obtained, and the dividend will give you the desired information. Thus, in working your example—"68 bars, quadruple time, M. ♩ = 72"—you will find that they take practically 3 minutes and 47 seconds to perform.

J. M. P. (Longwood).—You probably refer to Dr. Callcott's "Grammar of Music," which we think is out of print. The subjects which this book covers are now treated separately; and you would probably find that the primers, published by Novello and Co., on "The Rudiments of Music" (Cummings) and "Harmony" (Stainer) would meet your initial requirements.

C. E. L.—Sarasate made his first appearance in England in 1861, thirteen years earlier than is usually stated. He played at a conversazione given by the Vocal Association, St. James's Hall, May 22, 1861, his solo being a "Fantasia on themes from Masaniello" with the "additional accompaniments" of conversation and pedestrian exercise on the part of the audience. So far as we have been able to discover, Sarasate, who was then seventeen, did not give a concert or make other public appearances, though he may have done so.

T. L. (Birstall).—The last occasion on which Sir Frederick Bridge officiated as organist of Manchester Cathedral was, we believe, the last Sunday in August, 1875. The chant-book then in use was the "Manchester Chant-Book," edited by Dr. Troutbeck. Your third question is answered in the article on Sir Frederick Bridge in our present issue.

W. C. E.—We cannot be responsible for advertisements and other extraneous matter inserted in copies of The Musical Times by newsvendors.

Organum.—Sir George Martin's Te Deum was sung in the key of A flat, not in A, at the Jubilee service at St. Paul's, on June 22.

E. J.—We cannot give the names of concert agents.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Addlestone—Jubilee Thanksgiving Services were held in the Parish Church on June 20, when Martin's Te Deum, "Zadok the Priest," and the "Hallelujah" chorus were sung by an augmented choir accompanied by an orchestra. Mr. Patrick H. White presided at the organ and Mr. Oliver O. Brooksbank conducted.

Chichester.—The annual festival of the Association of Parochial Choirs in Chichester and its neighbourhood was held in the Cathedral on the 15th ult. The united choirs, which numbered nearly 300 voices, sang Horan's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in G and Barnby's effective anthem "I will give thanks." Mr. Seymour Kelly conducted with discretion, and the organ was safe in the experienced hands of Dr. F. J. Read, the Cathedral organist.

Chigwell.—The special choir of sixty voices sang Stanford's Evening Service and E. C. Nunn's setting of the 100th Psalm for baritone solo and chorus, at the Parish Church, on Ascension Day, under the direction of Mr. Henry Riding.——An organ recital of "Compositions of the Victorian Era" was given by Mr. Henry Riding on the 19th ult., when the programme was agreeably interspersed by vocal and volin solos, all by native composers.

Durham.—The annual festival of North-Eastern Cathedral and church choirs took place in the Cathedral, on the 6th ult. The united choirs, which numbered 692 voices, were under the able direction of Professor Armes, organist of the Cathedral. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were Cooke's familiar setting in G, to which Professor Armes had added string parts for the orchestra. Spohr's "The Christian's Prayer" furnished the anthem, in which Mr. J. Duncanson and Mr. Macdonald, both of Durham, rendered valuable service. The duties of organist were divided between Dr. Crow (Ripon), Mr. J. E. Jeffries (Newcastle Cathedral), and Mr. Robinson (deputy-organist of York Minster). The string band of twenty-six performers, led by Mr. Edward Laws, did themselves credit in their accompaniments to Handel's second Organ Concerto and in other portions of a very successful service.

Exeter.—The Exeter Diocesan Choral Association held its festival in the Cathedral, on the 6th ult., when the united choirs numbered nearly 1,000 voices. The service included Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, Varley Roberts in C; Te Deum in D, Hubert Parry; anthems, "Behold, my servant," Prout, and "O how amiable," John E. West. Dr. Wood, organist of the Cathedral, presided at the organ, and Mr. Roylands-Smith, who had carefully trained the choirs, conducted. Two trumpet players (Messrs. Ough and Gimblett) and two trombonists from the Marine band (Messrs. Bennett and Littlepage) rendered valuable assistance in the accompaniments.

Halifax, Nova Scotia.—The special music sung at the festival services in celebration of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee at the Cathedral Church, on Sunday, June 20, was selected from the programmes performed in Westminster Abbey at the Queen's Coronation and that of the Jubilee Service of 1887. The evening service terminated with the Old Hundredth. The musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. Frank Gatward.

Launceston.—The twenty-fifth annual festival service of the Launceston District Association of Church Choirs took place in the Parish Church on the 14th ult. Nine choirs, represented by nearly 200 voices, were present. The music included Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F (C. H. Lloyd) and Stainer's fine anthem "Awake, put on thy strength, O Zion." The singing was excellent, and reflected great credit upon Mr. Dalby, the Association choirmaster, who ably presided at the organ.

Leith.—A special Diamond Jubilee Service was held in North Leith Parish Church on June 20, which included Smart's Te Deum in F and Stainer's anthem "O clap your hands." The entire service was accompanied by combined military band (Forth Division, Royal Engineers, conductor, Mr. J. A. Moonie) and organ. Mr. R. D. Pettie, organist of the church, presided at the organ.

Llandaff.—The triennial festival of Welsh parochial choirs affiliated to the Llandaff Diocesan Church Choral Association took place on June 23 and 24. On the first day the united choirs numbered 1,000 voices, and on the second, 1,200. The principal features of the services were Gerard F. Cobb's Te Deum in G, Arnold's Magnificat in A, and Goss's fine anthem "Fear not, O land." A number of instrumentalists from Aberavon assisted in the accompaniments, and Mr. G. G. Beale was an efficient organist.

Newcastle (Staffs).—A festival of church choirs in the Rural Deanery of Newcastle, in connection with the Lichfield Diocesan Choral Association, took place in St. George's Church on the 1st ult. The choirs numbered about 250 voices. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis was Berthold Tours's bright setting in F, and Sullivan's "Hearken unto Me" furnished the anthem. After the sermon Wesley's "Blessed be the God and Father," which a local paper strangely designates "a somewhat ponderous composition," was sung. Mr. J. Alcock conducted, and Mr. J. T. Hughes, assistant-organist of Chester Cathedral, rendered exceptional service at the organ.

St. Columb.—On the 14th ult. the Pydar Deanery Association of Church Choirs held its festival in St. Columb Church, when Sir A. Sullivan's setting of "The strain upraise" was sung as the anthem. Miss Berryman was the organist.

Scarborough.—At the opening of the Exhibition a choir of forty picked voices sang Myles B. Foster's commemoration ode, "The Queen—God bless her," under the conductorship of Mr. R. J. Pitcher.——At an open-air festival on the Spa, on June 25, commemoration odes were sung by the Scarborough Choral Society, augmented to nearly 300 voices, under the direction of Mr. R. J. Pitcher, the society's conductor. Cowen's "All hail the glorious reign," Faning's "The Queen's Song," and Stainer's "The Triumph of Victoria" were well rendered by the well-balanced choir, and a fine volume of tone was produced. The "Hallelujah" chorus and the National Anthem were also sung. The Spa band accompanied and played selections, under its conductor, Mr. H. W. Turner. A united service of choirs was held at the Parish Church, when "Zadok the Priest" was performed, conducted by Mr. R. J. England.

Wigan.—A special Jubilee Service was held on Sunday afternoon, June 20, at the Wesleyan Church, Standishgate, when an appropriate selection of music was performed by a choir of sixty voices, under the direction of Mr. R. Moss, who presided at the organ. The programme included Cowen's "All hail the glorious reign," two excerpts from Mackenzie's Jubilee Ode, Barnby's effective "Victoria—our Queen," and Handel's "Hallelujah" chorus. Midway during the service Mr. Moss gave an interesting address upon the progress of music during the reign of Queen Victoria.

Choir Appointment.—Mr. Paul Hodges (Bass), to the Church of St. Mary, Aldermanbury.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. Sidney Preston, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mary the Virgin, Petworth.—Mr. Benjamin Kershaw, Organist and Choirmaster to Saddleworth Parish Church, near Oldham.—Mr. Albert E. Turner, Organist and Choirmaster to Trinity Congregational Church, Hanbury Street, Mile End New Town.

THE Celebrated "MAYSON" VIOLINS.—I have made an extensive PURCHASE of the above, including the deservedly admired "Hallé," so extensively noticed in the Violin Times and other papers, and am prepared to treat with buyers for the sale of this Artist's very best Instruments. I can with confidence say that the work is not done by assistants under his guidance, but absolutely by himself, therefore I can honestly recommend it. For excellence of workmanship, fine finish, and purity of tone, I consider them by far the noblest examples of the modern Violin. Address, Jacob Lomax, Durham Street, Bolton, Lancashire.

THE ROLLING SEASONS.

A New Harvest Cantata. By Caleb Simper.

Price 1s. 6d. net. Tonic Sol-fa, 1s. net.

Band Parts are also printed for Strings, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon, 2 Horns, 2 Cornets, 2 Trombones, Timpani, and Organ.

With the exception of Two Hymns and a Carol, the words are selected from the Holy Scriptures. The music, both Vocal and Instrumental, is attractive, interesting, and not difficult. It requires Four Soloists and Full Chorus, and occupies 35 minutes in performance. This Cantata may be rendered with Organ Accompaniment only, but the Orchestral Parts add greatly to the effect. It is especially suitable for Church use at Harvest-tide.

Opinions:—"We are all charmed with Cantata. My choir like it so much."—"The 'Rolling Seasons' is splendid."—"Cantata is delightful. I am sure it will have a large sale."—"We have Cantata in rehearsal, and like it very much."—"Cantata is bold, effective, and unique; we are much pleased with it."—"'Rolling Seasons' is exceedingly pretty."—"I like Cantata much, and shall prepare it for Whitsuntide."—"I am simply charmed with the Cantata; you have certainly achieved a great success."—"I consider it a ring studded with Gems."—"A perfect specimen of what a Cantata should be," &c.

SUITABLE FOR

THANKSGIVING SERVICES.

"The Biblical story of which Ruth is the central figure lends itself with remarkable suitability to an illustration of a harvest celebration. The country landscape, the ripened corn, the sturdy reapers, the standing sheaves, the active gleaners, and the busy farmer, all combine to fill the mind's eye with a pleasant scene of excitement. Set to music by a competent composer such as Mr. A. R. Gaul, the narrative of Ruth's eventful episode lends itself to a pathetic, picturesque, and pleasant performance. The bereaved and sorrowful trio of women on whom the calamity of poverty and famine has fallen, as if to give intensity to their greater grief, and the unexpected and happy influence of patriarchal benevolence displayed by the mighty Boaz, who so quickly transforms sorrow into joy, are all introduced and aptly take their allotted place in the melodious music of Gaul's interpretation of the tale."—Gloucester Citizen.

THE DREAM OF ENDYMION

J. BENNETT

MUSIC BY

FREDERIC H. COWEN.

Vocal Score, price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

THE TIMES.

Mr. Cowen has found in a famous passage of Keats's "Endymion" his inspiration for a wholly successful tenor scena called "The Dream of Endymion," in which the grace for which he has long been famous is prominent from beginning to end. The work is full of imagination, and what may be called the leading theme, taken as representative of the object of Endymion's adoration, is subjected to treatment that is always interesting. The composer has of late given us nothing of equal charm, nor anything so grateful to the singer.

STANDARD.

A new scena for tenor voice, "The Dream of Endymion," by Mr. F. H. Cowen, won cordial approbation. The eloquent words have received a noble setting, and the piece received the fullest justice from Mr. Ben Davies.

MORNING POST.

"The Dream of Endymion" is a fanciful composition in Mr. Cowen's best style, effectively written for the voice, and admirably orchestrated. It was beautifully sung by Mr. Ben Davies, who shared with the composer the loud applause that greeted the conclusion of the work.

DAILY NEWS.

Mr. Cowen, both from a melodic and a dramatic point of view, has given us of his best.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Mr. Cowen must be credited with a melodious and tasteful work, in the interpretation of which Mr. Ben Davies was eminently successful.

BALLAD

FREDERICK BRIDGE.

PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

Tonic Sol-fa, 9d. Words only, 12s. 6d. per 100. String Parts, 4s. 6d. Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

The vocal writing is decidedly effective. The work is undeniably above the average of "occasional" compositions, and is indeed worthy to rank with the composer's best efforts.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Dr. Bridge was well advised in selecting the poem as a text for his Jubilee Song. Good judgment equally appears in the musical treatment. Manifestly a work designed for the purpose here in view should be distinguished by features which recommend it to popular taste and feeling—that is to say, it should be tuneful, rhythmical, and simple. These are precisely the qualities that recommend the work under notice, and they are quite compatible with a large measure of picturesque effect and varied expression. . . . The picturesque poem and its happy setting, so full of spirit and fitness, at once pleased the public. The performance was indeed excellent, making quite justifiable the "ovation" promptly tendered to the principal singer and the composer-conductor. Dr. Bridge was thrice called to the platform.

STANDARD.

It opens with a martial figure on the dominant of F major, and this is heard again and again throughout the brief work. The "Winds of the World" are to declare "What is the Flag of England?" and they perform their task, Professor Bridge's music well illustrating, with all requisite variety of effect and musicianly feeling, the contrasts between the soft southern zephyrs and the wild north-easter. In the final section the vocal forces, including the soprano soloist, are divided into nine parts, and the climax is as stirring as it is musicianly instructive. The "Flag of England" is certain to prove popular with choral societies, for Professor Bridge's music is grateful for the voices, and the words are not more applicable to this than to any other year, being patriotic in a general sense.

DAILY NEWS.

The music, strictly choral, is of a descriptive character, admirably suited to the dramatic lines, while in the song of the South Wind, the soprano soloist (last night, Madame Albani) has a melodious solo supported by the female chorus, and the whole closes with a short but massive double chorus. The choir had evidently taken the greatest interest in the music of their chief, and the performance was well worthy the fame of our leading choral society. Four times was Professor Bridge called to the platform.

MORNING POST.

The finest portion of the work is undoubtedly the illustration of the words of the North Wind, and the music here attains very great expressive power, particularly in the setting of the line "And they died, but the flag of England blew free ere the spirit passed." . . . No little of the success of the work is due to the effectiveness of the scoring, which is always picturesque, and often most suggestive of the spirit of the text. . . . Few new works have had a more hearty reception.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

It may at once be said that the composer has thoroughly caught the spirit of the stirring and picturesque poem. . . . It is a thoroughly musicianlike production, and of its effectiveness there can be no question. That it will speedily be in demand by choral societies is certain, for it is marked by a freshness and energy not always apparent in compositions of this description. The large force of brass and percussion employed last night is not absolutely necessary to do justice to a work that has far more valid claims to attention than is indicated by liberal orchestral adjuncts. The choralists did their very best for their conductor's latest production, and the result was a great success.

F. CUNNINGHAM WOODS.

Price One Shilling each Book.

PREFACE.

There exists already an abundant supply of original compositions and arrangements suitable for performance on large and comprehensive organs, but the many organists who have only a small instrument at their disposal in country churches often have some difficulty in finding short and easy Voluntaries suitable for their own use and the instruction of their pupils. It is hoped that "The Village Organist" (which will be issued in shilling numbers) may supply this want, so much felt by that valuable and zealous class of church-workers to whom the work is inscribed. The Editors have endeavoured to bring together a collection of pieces which they trust will prove to be at once simple, without being uninteresting, and effective where the instrumental resources are limited.

"This charming work was composed for the pupils of King Edward VI.'s High School for Girls, Birmingham, and bears all the best marks of the composer's characteristically graceful style. The libretto is of a high order of merit, and worth the music, which from first to last is attractive and without a dull page."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

SIX ACTION SONGS

MARY HUTCHINSON

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"These delightful songs were written and composed for, and are affectionately dedicated to, the children of the Kindergarten Section of the Church of England College for Girls at Edgbaston. Were there naught else to recommend them, the six titles would invite for the songs universal acceptance. Who could resist 'Haymakers,' 'Fairy Bells,' 'Flower Fairies,' 'The English Flag,' 'Calling the Cows,' and 'Fishermen'? We confess to a desire to see some of these songs done as the accompanying 'rubric' suggests. In 'Haymakers' the boys should be scythe-carriers, their action that of mowing; the little girls should imitate raking. This, with the quaint and pretty melody, and the refrain, 'Work, work, clearly we call; work, work, steadily all,' must be a grateful vision to parents, and a pleasant recreation to children, who may thank their stars that they have been born in a day which has a Mary Hutchinson and an Alfred R. Gaul to further gild the golden hours of childhood."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

ENGLISH FANTASIA

COMPOSED BY

EDWARD GERMAN.

String Parts, Five Shillings and Sixpence.
Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

Beyond the essentially English style of his "English Fantasia," as it is also called, Mr. Edward German has introduced nothing that is not original, so that there is no reason why the charming work should not be heard frequently after this year's festival is over. It well deserves a place in the regular repertory of English compositions, for it is most vigorous and spontaneous. The workmanship of all three movements is admirable, and the thematic material happily invented. The composer, who conducted, was recalled twice at the close.

STANDARD.

There is considerable Wagnerian feeling in this rather rhapsodical work, which is alternately warlike and peaceful in manner. The Fantasia, which is, unquestionably, very clever, was warmly received.

MORNING POST.

In writing his Fantasia Mr. German has evidently had Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" in his mind, and has striven to produce a sort of British equivalent to that gorgeous musical glorification of the German Empire. He has not made use of any national melodies, but has preferred to rely upon his own inspiration. The scoring is extremely clever, although the percussion instruments are somewhat unduly prominent. Very quaint is the second section, with its solo for the cor anglais.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

The "English Fantasia" is bright and spirited, thoroughly national in character, and very effectively scored. The audience were so pleased with it that they twice recalled the composer.

"Of the vocal performance it is really no more than simple justice to say that a better has rarely been given in recent years. The Tannhäuser of Mr. Henry Beaumont came with surprise; even upon those who already knew him to be a good artist. His beautiful and perfectly trained tenor voice never was heard to such great advantage. In the difficult declamatory music it told with marked clearness of enunciation and purity of tone, and in those passages, notably in the Hall of Minstrelsy, where pathos and dramatic fervour are required, he quite surpassed himself. MACDONALD SMITH'S SYSTEM.

("FROM BRAIN TO KEYBOARD.")

"Likely to be one of the most valuable weapons which has been added to the armoury of the modern teacher during this century."—SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE.

RECENT TESTIMONY.

"I play old pieces infinitely better (without practice) than I used to when working at them."—G. P., London.

"I have done no finger studies of any sort since your instructions came, yet I can play ever so much better."—E., Mus. Bac., F.R.C.O.

"Difficulties which were once almost insurmountable now seem to fall to pieces as I play. The keyboard, which once seemed hard and unyielding, has now become like velvet to my fingers."—D. PARKES, Plymouth.

"Was afraid to play a piece in public. Now I have no fear at all. I play no technical exercises."—H., Mus. Bac.

"To me it has been a veritable godsend."—C. S. PARSONSON, Mus. Bac.

"You were quite right in assuming that I was in the habit of playing with a limp arm. I have derived wonderful benefit from your hint on this point."—K., Belfast.

"I had decided to send this piece (Czerny's Toccata) with test passages marked, but on playing it to-day I find the difficulties have almost vanished."—C., L.R.A.M.

"My technique has improved wonderfully—nay, almost incredibly. . . I never feel the need of them (technical exercises) now; during the last few months I have done nothing of the sort."—C. T. R. SCOTT, Brus sels

"For lightness of touch I would not take off my hat to anybody. A lady said to me the other day that I must have practised a great deal to procure such a touch, and when I told her I did not practise at all at the keyboard, she looked dumbfounded."—W., F.R.C.O.

"I have found the system of the greatest possible use in teaching the piano, more particularly in the case of adult pupils, to many of whom music is now a delight instead of a toil as formerly. To teachers whose time is so fully occupied that they have no time for practice, Macdonald Smith's system is worth ten times the modest fee which he charges for lessons."—CHAS. G. BRYAN, Southport.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1897.

DR. EDWARD JOHN HOPKINS.

"COME and stay with me at the little pill-box I have built here, and pebble the imaginary porpoises that are never seen on this coast." Such was the genial form of an invitation sent to us by "the father of English organists" from his Herne Bay residence. No more favourable opportunity could present itself for acquiring some information upon the long career of the Temple organist than during some pleasant walks and talks with him at the quiet Kentish watering-place, where for two lovely August days we had the pleasure of being his guest.

Edward John Hopkins was born at Westminster, June 30, 1818. He comes of a musical stock. His father, George Hopkins, and his father's brother, Edward Hopkins, were both excellent clarinettists, and as such they played in the orchestra at Covent Garden at the production of Weber's opera "Oberon" (April 12, 1826), under the composer's direction. Two brothers of the subject of our sketch, John and Thomas Hopkins, also became organists—the former is now organist of Rochester Cathedral; the latter (died 1893) was organist of St. Saviour's Church, York, and, like his eminent brother, was a very fine extempore player. The other branch of the family deserves further mention. In addition to being the first clarinettist of his day, Edward Hopkins (Dr. E. J. Hopkins's uncle) was a bandmaster, and was at the head of the band of the Scots Guards in 1815. His son, Edward, became a Vicar Choral of Armagh Cathedral; another son, John Larkin (died 1873), was organist of Rochester Cathedral and afterwards of Trinity College, Cambridge, and University organist; his daughter, Louisa, who was King's Scholar at the Royal Academy of Music in 1834, married one Richard Lloyd, and their son, Edward, has since been heard of as a famous tenor singer. Music, therefore, as the above record of eminence shows, was, and is, a very strong characteristic of the Hopkins family.

Master E. J. Hopkins, like Goss and Sullivan, began his musical career as one of the children of the Chapel Royal, St. James's. He entered in 1826 when he was eight years old. The Master of the Children at that time was William Hawes, with whom his little charges lived at Adelphi Terrace, Strand. Hawes was also Master of the St. Paul's choristers, and young Hopkins, having a good voice and being an excellent reader, was made to do double duty at the Chapel Royal and St. Paul's, though he was not officially in the choir of the Cathedral. Master Hopkins's Sunday "putting on" (and off) of his "garments of praise" was as follows: He would appear at St. Paul's in his ordinary attire at the 9.45 a.m. service. At a certain part of the service he would retire, rush up to Adelphi Terrace and change into his gold and scarlet Charles II. court dress (change No. 1) and hie off to the Chapel Royal for the noon devotions. At 2.15, under Mr. Hawes's roof, he would partake of a frugal and hasty dinner, as he had to change his habiliments again (change No. 2) and get to St. Paul's by 3.15. As in the morning, he would leave before the service was finished and, hastening back to his domicile, would change again into his gorgeous raiment (change No. 3) and proceed to St. James's for the half-past five o'clock Evening Prayer. Back to Adelphi Terrace for the final change of his garb (change No. 4) might naturally be thought sufficient in the way of Sabbath achievements for a boy of tender years, especially when his "lightning changes," his scanty meals, and his pedestrian necessities are taken into account. But Master Hopkins was, and, as a boy of older growth, still is, an enthusiast, and before going home to Westminster to spend the night he would call in at St. Martin's-in-the-Fields and play the outgoing voluntary for his master, Thomas Forbes Walmisley. Mr. Hawes was a type of schoolmaster now happily almost extinct. He used to get a boy's head under his arm, and, as Dr. Hopkins says, "literally knock it into him." Many were the pranks the boys played. Mr. Hawes was very fond of a day's fishing, but those occasions were dreaded by the boys. If their master was successful they, on the following day, would have the smallest of the catch for dinner; if otherwise, their corporeal insufficiencies would give place to corporal excesses at the hands (or, in both cases, the rod) of Mr. Hawes.

The first State function in which Dr. Hopkins took part was the coronation of William IV. (September 8, 1831) in Westminster Abbey, when he sang as a soprano in his official capacity as a Chapel Royal boy. The last was the Diamond Jubilee of Queen Victoria, when the veteran ex-chorister lustily sang his tenor part on the steps of St. Paul's Cathedral, the two events being separated by a period of sixty-six years. At the coronation service the choir attended at Westminster Abbey at seven o'clock in the morning for a rehearsal. The sandwiches which the boys took for their lunch were eaten in the cab on the way to the Abbey. In the interval between the rehearsal and the ceremony the choristers explored the regions under the scaffolding of the temporarily erected choir seats. One of the boys, upon climbing up, discovered sundry refreshment packets carefully deposited by the adult singers in their hats. Such a temptation was too strong for those hungry young rascals to resist. Packet after packet was thrown down, duly caught in spread-out surplices, and their contents speedily demolished. Great must have been the discomfiture of those who, having brought material wherewith to satisfy nature's cravings at a long coronation service, found that it had made its way into other channels.

In 1833, at the age of fifteen, young Hopkins left the Chapel Royal. As a boy he had the run of two organ-builders' factories, and thus very early he began those studies in organ construction—or, as the late Sir George Macfarren happily put it, the "physiology of the instrument"—upon which he is now so eminent an authority. He took lessons in harmony and counterpoint from Thomas Forbes Walmisley, organist of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields. In regard to the organ, Dr. Hopkins is entirely self-taught. Living at Westminster, he had frequent opportunities of gaining access to the organ-loft at Westminster Abbey through the kindness of James Turle, who was a good friend to the young musician. Turle would occasionally allow him to play part of the service; and thus, by close observation, practical experience, and having to make his own way in the world, young Hopkins, like many others before and after him, laid a good, solid foundation of earnest, painstaking work, which, if pursued with steady perseverance and set purpose, is sure to bring its full reward.

His first organ appointment was at Mitcham Church, where, strangely enough, the late James Coward, formerly organist of the Crystal Palace, and the late Sir Joseph Barnby both began their careers as organists. Hopkins, in his candidature for the post, again found a kind friend in Turle. A few days before the competition Hopkins was in the Abbey organ-loft, when Turle said: "I want you to play the Psalms to-day, so that I can go downstairs to hear the effect." He did not return, and when it came to "Here endeth the first lesson," Hopkins had to play the "Magnificat." He enjoyed playing so much that he hoped Turle would not return for the "Nunc dimittis." The Abbey organist did not re-appear, even for the anthem, therefore the ex-chorister, to his proud delight, finished the service entirely by himself. When he came down from the organ he saw that Turle was speaking to a gentleman who, he afterwards discovered, was one of the most influential of the Mitcham committee of selection. Hopkins was then a youth of sixteen in a light blue jacket-suit with gilt buttons. The competition took place, and No. 7 (Hopkins) was chosen; but his sixteen years, to say nothing of his "jacket-suit," were against him, and the committee hesitated to appoint one so young. Then the influential amateur, who had been present in the Abbey, delivered Turle's message: "Tell them (the committee), with my compliments, that if they fear to trust Hopkins to accompany chants and hymns in Mitcham Church, Mr. Turle does not hesitate to intrust him to play services and anthems in Westminster Abbey." That, of course, settled the question, and Hopkins was appointed at a salary of forty guineas a year. Like Barnby in after years, he used to walk both ways (sixteen miles in all) every Sunday, in all weathers. On a very wet day he would hear the suction of the water in his boots as he played the pedals. In winter time the walk home was very dreary, there being no lamp till the London end of Clapham Common was reached. The organ, which had just been erected, was a "G organ" with "an octave and a half of pedal pipes." The services, in the morning and afternoon only, were in strong contrast to those in parish churches of the present day. Seated around the organ in the West gallery were the choir, which consisted of the school children, who were rehearsed by the young organist at ten o'clock on Sunday morning. Only the Venite, the Glorias to the Psalms, and two metrical Psalm-tunes were sung. The Psalms, Te Deum, Jubilate, &c., were all read. Previous to the advent of the new organ and the young organist, the singing—what little there was of it—was accompanied by a quartet of strings. Whatever the feelings of the previous "chief musician" in being deposed in favour of young Hopkins, he must have accepted the inevitable in a highly philosophical manner, as he became the organ-blower! One day he said to the new organist: "Will you lend me your copy of 'Wonderful! Counsellor!' (referring to 'For unto us')? My two boys, who play the first and second fiddles, will sing and play the soprano and alto parts. John Smith will sing the bass and play the tenor; and I will play the bass and sing the tenor!"

After being at Mitcham for four years "Mr." Hopkins became organist of St. Peter's, Islington. He had opened the organ, and was asked to become the organist. The instrument (built by Messrs. Walker) was a G organ with one and a half octaves of unison pedal pipes and a tenor C swell with four stops. The services at Islington were in the morning and evening. In making the change Mr. Hopkins did not save anything in walking, because, as he came home in the middle of the day, he had to walk four miles four times, instead of eight miles twice. In 1841, wishing to be nearer home, he became organist of St. Luke's, Berwick Street, Soho, of which church the vicar was the Rev. W. H. Brookfield, Thackeray's friend. This appointment he held for two years, when he began his long and remarkable reign at the Temple Church.

A few steps from the busy thoroughfare of Fleet Street and the portal of the celebrated Temple Church is reached. Its history, its architecture, its monuments, its organ, and its organist vie with each other in their claims to surpassing interest. The church is an exquisitely beautiful Gothic building, delightful to contemplate. It was built by the Knights Templars in the reign of Henry II., in imitation of the Temple of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. The sacred edifice practically consists of two churches joined together. The circular and older portion, the finest of the four round churches still existing in England, is transition and early English, and was consecrated in 1185. The choir, or square portion, is pure early English, and was consecrated in 1240. It is said that "no building in existence so completely develops the gradual and delicate advance of the Pointed Style over the Norman as this Church, being commenced in the latter and finished in the highest of the former. The choir, or square part, is decidedly the most exquisite specimen of pointed architecture existing." Some of the Crusaders are buried here, and the cross-legged recumbent monuments of the Knights Templars at once attract attention. Oliver Goldsmith is buried in the churchyard.

The organ in the Temple Church is of great historical interest. About 1683 the Benchers were desirous of obtaining the best possible organ. Bernhardt Schmidt, a German, who was afterwards Anglicised as "Father Smith," competed with Renatus Harris for the honour of supplying the instrument. Each builder erected an organ in the church. Father Smith's was placed in a gallery at the West end of the square portion, and Harris placed his on the South side of the Communion Table. The two instruments were played upon on alternate Sundays. Dr. Blow and Henry Purcell performed upon Smith's organ, while Harris employed Draghi, organist to Queen Catherine. The contest was so severe that both organs were played upon at the same service; and after repeated trials, lasting for nearly twelve months, the Benchers, at the end of 1687 or the beginning of 1688, decided upon Father Smith's instrument by reason of its "Depthe and Strengthe of Sound." It may be interesting to give the original specification of this celebrated instrument:—

With 3 full setts of keyes and quarter notes

(Signed) Ber. Smith.

Sealed and delivered in the p^r^sence of
Geo. Miniett. Tho. Griffin. Rich^d^. Cooke.

The cost of this organ of 1,715 pipes (including "alsoe the curtaine rods and curtaines and all other goods and chattles being in or belonging to the said organ and organ-loft") was £500, according to the deed of sale, dated June 21, 1688. The deed was thus quaintly headed:

"Mr. Bernard Smythes Bargaine and Sale of ye Organ in ye Temple Church to both ye Societys of ye Temple."

It will be observed that there was no pedal organ. Amongst other reasons which led to the choice of Father Smith's organ, were its greater "sweetnes and fulnes of Sound, besides ye extraordinary Stopps, quarter Notes, and other Rarityes therein." The "quarter notes" were two additional chromatic semitones in each octave, A flat and D sharp, which improved certain scales in the unequal temperament tuning then in vogue. Our illustration shows these divided black keys—the upper (raised) portions being A flat and D sharp; they were, however, disused c. 1865, when the organ was tuned to equal temperament. At the present time the organ consists of four manuals (CC to g^3) and a pedale (CCC to F); sixty sounding stops, ten couplers, and 3,709 pipes. It has always been, and still is, noted for its beautiful mellow tone.

In 1842 the church was completely restored. At that time an oak screen with glass windows and doors (as shown in our illustration) filled up the beautiful arches which divided the square from the round church, whereby the latter was made a sort of vestibule to the former. This screen was then very properly removed and the two churches became practically one. An organ chamber was also built on the North side of the square church, and the instrument was transferred from the West gallery to its present position. Hitherto a quartet choir had occupied seats in front of the organ; but at the restoration of the church a surpliced choir and cathedral service were introduced. Previously to 1842 there were only three surpliced choirs in London — St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, and the Chapel Royal, St. James's. The Temple choir made the fourth.

The Temple Church being a lawyers' church, and situated in the midst of lawyers' chambers, the most appropriate hymn at its services is said to be "Brief life is here our portion"; but longevity, and not "brief life," is the natural environment of the organ-loft, its present occupant being in his eightieth year. Dr. Hopkins played his first probationary service on Sunday, May 7, 1843, and was appointed organist and choirmaster in the following autumn. He has therefore been organist to the Honourable Societies of the Temple for the remarkable period of fifty-four years! The contest for the appointment lay between Dr. Hopkins and George Cooper. The former was then organist of St. Luke's, Berwick Street, and as his vicar (Mr. Brookfield) did not like the absences necessitated by the probationary services at the Temple, he practically discharged his organist. When the final settlement of the Temple appointment came to be made, Hopkins and Cooper were declared "about equal." One of the Benchers then got up and said, that as Mr. Hopkins had lost his late appointment through playing for them, he thought that he should get the post. This suggestion was adopted, and Mr. Edward John Hopkins, then aged twenty-five, was duly elected.

Such a position afforded fine scope for this young man's exceptional abilities. His extempore playing has always excited the admiration, often the envy, of those who have been privileged to hear it. The charm of it at once strikes the ear in the opening voluntary, which Dr. Hopkins dignifies not only in its masterly treatment, but in its importance. In his masterly introductions to the anthems he has no equal. He takes a theme, which is always melodious and interesting, and works it in a variety of ways and keys. Sometimes he seems to have wandered so far away from the original key that one wonders when and how he will get back again, when, lo! as if by a wizard's touch, he introduces some unexpected or enharmonic chord, and the return is accomplished as if by magic. As an accompanist Dr. Hopkins is quite unrivalled. Brought up as a singer himself, he has always studied his singers—amongst whom have been Mr. W. H. Cummings and the late Mr. Lewis Thomas—in a most sympathetic degree. He is very particular as to a clear articulation of the words and the importance of poetic feeling. The spirit of devotion is a highly commendable feature in his work. He would scorn to allow the Psalms to be chanted in the scandalously rapid and irreverent manner of some churches, whereby these matchless creations are divested of all their poetic beauty. Dr. Hopkins's views on chanting may be found in the thoughtful and elaborate preface which he contributed to his "Temple Psalter," the pointing of which has many features of interest.

It is no wonder that the Temple Church has been a veritable Mecca for young organists, who have greatly profited thereby. Many a lesson of the greatest value in organ accompaniment has been given from that organ-loft by its venerable organist. With the Benchers of the two Honourable Societies—who each contribute a moiety of the expenses connected with the church—Dr. Hopkins has ever been on terms of the greatest cordiality and respect, and he is frequently their guest in the Halls at luncheon on Sundays. On the occasion of his jubilee as their organist they presented him with a purse of one hundred guineas and a silver tea and coffee service which bore the following inscription:—

Presented,
Together with a Purse of 100 Guineas, to
Edward John Hopkins, Esq., Mus. Doc., by the Societies of the Inner and Middle Temple, as a mark of Gratitude and Esteem on the completion of the period of Fifty Years, during which he has presided at the Organ of the Temple Church, and in recognition of the zeal, ability, and distinguished success with which he has discharged the duties of Organist, Teacher of the Choir Boys, and Director of the Choir.

Dr. Hopkins has been one of the pioneers in several musical institutions—e.g., The Musical Antiquarian Society (1840), for which he edited madrigals by Bennet and Weelkes; the Handel Society (1843); the Royal College of Organists (1864); and the Musical Association (1874). He is a Member of the Royal Society of Musicians (1851), Honorary Member of the Royal Academy of Music (1871), and he received his degree of Doctor of Music from the Archbishop of Canterbury in 1882. He is professor of the organ at the Royal Normal College for the Blind at Norwood. Of his many organ pupils perhaps the most distinguished is Mr. Alfred Hollins.

Although the life-work of Dr. Hopkins is chiefly and inseparably connected with the Temple Church, he has other claims to distinction which we can only briefly notice. As a composer for the church his fame is widely spread. As early as 1838, and again in 1840, he took two Gresham prize medals with his anthems "Out of the deep" and "God is gone up." Other important anthems are "The King shall rejoice" (in celebration of the marriage of the Prince of Wales in 1863), "God who commandest the light to shine" (Thanksgiving for the recovery of the Prince of Wales, 1872), "Thou shalt cause the trumpet of the Jubilee to sound" (composed for Queen Victoria's Jubilee, 1887, for which the Benchers voted the composer fifty guineas), "The Lord is full of compassion" (composed for his own Jubilee, May 7, 1893), and many others; amongst his smaller anthems being the ever popular "Let us even now go unto Bethlehem" (Christmas), which Dr. Hopkins wrote specially for The Musical Times. His fine Services, while upholding the solemn dignity which has always characterised the best English Church music, are tinged with a modern form of expression which enhances their attractiveness.

But it is chiefly as a composer of hymn-tunes and chants that Dr. Hopkins is most widely known, not only in the Established Church of England, but in countless churches and chapels wherever the English language is spoken. It is difficult to say how many hymn-tunes he has composed. His popular unison tune to "Saviour, again to Thy dear name we raise," is, with the exception of one inflected note at the end of the second line, in the Mixo-Lydian mode—it begins and ends on the fifth of the scale, and the melody is kept within the octave. One great charm of his tunes is the smoothness and singableness of the inner voices. In many of them the alto and tenor parts run the soprano very close in point of melodiousness. In addition to his own "Temple Service Book," Dr. Hopkins has been musical editor of "The Wesleyan Hymn Book," "The Free Church of Scotland Hymnal," "Hymnal of the Presbyterian Church in Canada," "Church Praise" (Presbyterian Church of England), and the "Congregational Hymnal." Thus various sections of the Christian Church, in different parts of the world, reap the benefit of his experience and refined taste. Although he has not been so prolific a composer for the organ, his original pieces and arrangements for the "King of Instruments" maintain the same high standard of excellence. While on the subject of his organ music it may be interesting to record that we are indebted to Dr. Hopkins for the metronomic rates in Mendelssohn's Organ Sonatas. One day he called at the shop of Messrs. Coventry and Hollier, the English publishers of the work, and was shown an early proof copy of the Sonatas. He suggested that Mendelssohn should be asked to indicate the rates of speed, and this excellent suggestion was at once adopted by the composer. Mention must also be made of "The Organ: its history and construction," written by Dr. Hopkins and the late Dr. Rimbault, which has long been the standard work on the subject. Especially valuable are the articles "Accompaniment" and "Organ" which Dr. Hopkins contributed to Sir George Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians." He has also read many interesting papers before various societies, and is senior editor of the "Organist and Choirmaster."

Dr. Hopkins, now in his eightieth year, might well be the envy of many men half his age. He enjoys wonderful health, which he largely attributes to his lifelong habit of taking plenty of walking exercise and his simple mode of living. His faculties show no sign of impoverishment. His intellect is vigorous and keen. He can tell a capital story and, like many musicians, he dearly loves a joke. As a proof of his industry and marvellous vitality, he begins his day's work between five and six o'clock every morning, when, sitting up in bed, he writes away at his "Handbook for the Organ," which Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. will shortly publish. He is sparing no pains to make this book worthy of his great reputation and his unique experience. To judge from the early chapters, which we recently perused at the octogenarian's "pill-box," we feel sure that it will fulfil all the expectations that have been formed of it.

May the hand of time deal gently with the kindly "father of English organists" all through the eventide of his long and useful life.

We are indebted to Mr. Edmund Macrory, Q.C., one of the Benchers of the Middle Temple, for kind permission to use the two engravings from his interesting little book "A few notes on the Temple Organ." Also to Mr. Augustus Littleton, for the photograph of the Temple Church and that of Sir Frederick Bridge's house in our last issue, both of which were specially taken for this journal.

FROM MY STUDY.

A story has just gone round concerning a venerable lady, Mrs. Köhler, who recently passed from a world in which she had lived through ninety-two years. Mrs. Köhler, we are told, was not only a contemporary of Tom Moore, but an acquaintance, and it is said that once when strolling in a garden with the poet, she plucked a rose and, presenting it to her companion, said, "I have given you the last rose of summer." "My child," replied Moore, "you have made a most beautiful suggestion," the result of which was the famous lyric now among the precious possessions of our race. Experience teaches us to be cautious in receiving stories that come tagged on to the names of the illustrious departed. They are easy to make up, difficult to refute, and flourish accordingly. But there is nothing inherently improbable in the Köhler tale, and it certainly accounts in a pretty way for one of the sweetest and saddest of the "Irish Melodies."

A writer in the Daily Telegraph has taken the story as the text of an interesting article, in which he suggests that certain melodies have a power of touching the springs of human emotion such as is denied to others equally tuneful. I cannot quote the whole of the argument tending to the conclusion just stated, but may give a fair summary of it. After referring to "learned doctors of the science" who can elaborate profound theories as to the relation of music to the universe at large, the writer continues—"But not all the Wagnerites who ever Wagnerised can explain how it is that simple airs, not technically or demonstrably excelling others in beauty of musical phrasing, or even in freshness or novelty of inspiration, should awaken an echo in thousands of human hearts from which millions of other strains as melodious evoke no response." Some may object that this statement rather begs the main question whether any such distinction actually exists. Waiving this point, let us follow the writer when he says: "Perhaps, however, it is natural enough that science should be unable to explain their charm, since it has generally nothing to do with their production. They do not come by taking thought, any more than the words to which they are sometimes immortally wedded. The wind of the spirit that gives life to them bloweth where it listeth, and in many cases it lists to blow at the most unexpected seasons and under circumstances of the most casual occurrence." In the passage just quoted we have a hint of special inspiration — the action of a force outside ourselves—which, if recognised in this argument, may, of course, account for the existence of a special power in certain melodies. Let us, for the sake of the argument, admit it here, and at once we are confronted with the fact that the wind of special and distinguishing inspiration, blowing where it listeth, refuses its full vitality to tunes unconnected with words.

It was impossible for the writer in our contemporary not to see confronting him the formidable objection that the melodies of which he speaks do not stand alone, and that the special power exercised by some of them may be due, in a greater or less degree, to the connected words. Like a brave man, therefore, he addresses himself to the obstacle, and, first of all, makes handsome concessions to it, saying: "National songs, for instance, have, no doubt, their future secured to them in virtue of the patriotic sentiment to which they appeal. Many of the lyrics of Burns, again, have unquestionably derived their immortality from the endearment of their author's name and memory to the Scottish heart. So, too, the words of 'Home, sweet home'—or rather the theme which elevates their commonplace into the region of poetry—did, perhaps, as much as the mere melody of that universally beloved ditty to ensure it its perennial life." The amplitude of this concession tends decidedly to cut the ground from under the idea that certain song-melodies have a special power of exciting emotion not possessed by others equally beautiful. At any rate, it indicates a reasonable explanation of popularity, and the only one not resting upon surmise. But the writer goes on to declare that the "Last Rose of Summer" "lives by its tune and by that alone." "Its words," he continues, "have that grace of expression and sweetness of feeling which may satisfy the ear and mind; but, unassisted by its melody they could never, probably, have found their way to a single human heart. It was at the touch of Music that a hidden soul was awakened in the lines, and their pretty but frigid rhetoric thrilled into a life they have never lost." The point so eloquently put seems to me exceedingly debatable. I question, in the first place, whether Moore's lyric is as powerless as we here find it described. It should be remembered that the public who decree the life or death of such things are not critics of poetry.

Nor are they very susceptible to the temperature of rhetoric. But appeal to them with a homely and universal sentiment—one of those feelings which have the force of instinct, if, indeed, they be not instinctive, and their attention is at once secured; their sympathy at once called forth. Unlike the writer in the Daily Telegraph, I hold that "The Last Rose of Summer" makes such an appeal and goes to the heart. The picture drawn in the first quatrain—

'Tis the last rose of summer,
All its lovely companions,

is pathetic in itself and in its suggestions, while the entire little poem is steeped in tender sentiment which all can appreciate. Wherefore I cannot admit that the popularity of the air, beautiful as it is, owes nothing to association. Whenever heard, the melody brings to us the solitary flower, the pathos of its loneliness and the imminence of its doom; all which has its counterpart in the experience of human life. The writer from whom I have freely quoted adds, "It (the song) was warbled in 'Martha' àpropos of nothing in particular, and the rapturous applause with which audiences always received it affords the most conclusive of all possible proofs that the tune is everything and the words 'stark naught.'" Probably my vision is defective, but I cannot see the proof so confidently pointed out. To my mind, the occurrence of the song in an opera does not touch the question one way or another. It is the song still; its sentiment remains; its fragrance is undiminished, and its associations are felt as much in the theatre as in the drawing-room. Where, then, is the most conclusive of all possible proofs that the tune is everything and the words stark naught?

Let us get a little closer to the main point, which is, I repeat, the proposition that certain melodies have a power of exciting emotion which others of equal beauty do not possess. The Daily Telegraph writer styles this a "keyless mystery," and puts the enigma in another form—namely, "that some secret chords are buried deep in the universal heart of man which vibrate everywhere and always to certain arrangements of musical sounds, and are blankly irresponsive to others." Here we have a curious and interesting suggestion which, if correct, deserves the most careful study. How are we to test it? Obviously it will not do to take our examples from melodies which are associated with thoughts or emotions, or things in themselves extraneous to music. There must be no foreign element to vitiate the result of the analysis; we must keep to the region of "pure" or abstract tune. Our contemporary has overlooked this. He remains entirely within the region where tune is inseparably blended with the thoughts, feelings, and pictorial representations of poetry.

I have not to consider the general question of the power of abstract melody, and am very glad thereof, since it would lead me far afield. But it is possible to give the result of experience on the point whether certain melodies have a special power independent of the qualities which they share with others. The suggestion is that of two tunes equally beautiful, one shall deeply move the heart; the other leave it comparatively untouched. As a subject of investigation this is obviously complicated by the fact that the touchstone to which the melodies are applied—that is to say, human feeling—varies more or less with the individual. I, for example, may be profoundly impressed by the second theme in the slow movement of the Choral Symphony; while you are moved less by that than by its companion and predecessor. We may, however, leave this matter out of count; the proposition we are considering being one that takes no note of exceptions. It can be established only by such general experience of its truth as suffices to constitute a rule. Fairly confronting it, we are struck by the fact that no "pure" or abstract melody exercises power approaching in universality and strength that put forth by song-tunes, unless, as in the case of funeral and wedding marches, &c., it has become rich in association with extraneous things, and so has entered the same category as the song-tune. The "pure" theme has undoubtedly an influence. It can exhilarate, like the subject of the Scherzo in the Ninth Symphony; it can charm, like a lovely Minuet by Haydn or Mozart; it can awe, like the Finale of Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic." But the feeling it calls forth is moderate in strength. Excitement, such as sometimes sweeps over an audience when a popular song is sung, does not lie within its scope, and is only associated with it when an orchestra lends the stimulus of sonority and colour. Such a subject is, indeed, little apprehended by any save the musically cultured, whose refinement of perception and taste answer the appeal of its wordless and indefinite eloquence, as an Æolian harp responds to the faintest sigh of the night wind. In the comparatively serene region of "pure" melody we vainly look for evidence of power with a secret, There is no such "keyless mystery," whatever other may exist. The source and cause of feeling lies in attributes that are on the surface, and with a glance the musician can perceive the full effect of much melody which, perhaps, he has yet to hear. Believers in an occult afflatus, which breathes as it listeth upon the flowers in the garden of tune, may reasonably be called upon to produce examples in proof. This I strongly doubt if they can do. I certainly know no melody the measure of the power of which cannot be accounted for on artistic grounds, leaving no margin for explanation by reference to influences in a sense superhuman. Even thus the region of "pure" music is one of infinite, and therefore exhaustless, beauty. It is the inner temple of the art, from which all alien sights and sounds are excluded, and where alone the truest and highest influences of music are received into our being. The poetry of words is not wanted there. It would only limit and encumber another poetry, compared with which it is grossly material. An American writer, R. W. Gilder, has happily touched this subject:

> This day I heard such music that I thought:
> Hath human speech the power thus to be wrought
> Into such melody, such pure sensuous sound?

He answers the question:

> Unto itself sufficient is each art,
> And each doth utter what none other can—
> Some hidden mood of the large soul of man.
> Ah, think not thou with words well interweaved
> To wake the tones wherein the viol grieved
> With its most heavy burden; think not thou,
> Adventurous, to push thy shallop's prow
> Into that surge of well remembered tones,
> Striving to make each wandering wind that groans,
> Each bell that tolls, and every bugle's blowing,
> With some most fitting word, some verse bestowing
> A never-shifting form on that which passed
> Swift as a bird that glimmers down the blast.
> So, still unworded, save in memory mute,
> Rest thou sweet hour of viol and of lute,—
> Of thoughts that never, never can be spoken,
> Too frail for the rough usage of men's words—
> Thoughts that shall keep their silence all unbroken
> Till music once more stirs them,—then like birds
> That in the night-time slumber, they shall wake
> While all the leaves of all the forest shake.

To music associated with words is given the speech which thrills and impassions, which floods the soul with tender emotions, which unites two high poesies and inspires the indefiniteness of the one with the definiteness of the other. Through it even a humble melody appears transformed, and wears a radiant garment. The life of such a transfigured theme is no mystery, but emanates from its connection with the pathetic or the heroic in humanity. Beyond and above is the region of music only, where those who enter find serener thoughts and larger liberty, with that expansion and elevation of soul which stimulates the highest utterance whereof the soul is capable. Happy are they who walk there, not waiting for inspiration, but working for it.

X.

ANALYTICAL PROGRAMMES.

In the Musical World of December 2, 1836, there is a letter written to the Editor by Mr. Charles H. Purday, in which he complains that the public are "as ignorant (generally speaking) of the true character, design, and end of those stupendous efforts of genius (i.e., the works of Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven) as are the Hottentots of their existence." But he is not content to complain; he makes a proposition, which if carried into effect would, he thinks, make the public not only more interested in the works they hear, but enable them to understand somewhat of their true character and design. Mr. Purday's proposition is:

> That a prologue, if I may use the term, should preface every performance of the works of the great masters, giving a brief and pithy analysis of the composition to be performed, showing its relative character to the mind of the musician, the feelings by which he was actuated in the production of his work, and the circumstances (where known) under which it was brought out: this would, by the novelty, in the first place, attract attention, and, by frequent repetition, keep that attention alive and lead us in tracing the mind of the author through the productions of his pen; and the design of his work would thus be made clear to the understanding of the amateur, and infuse in him the desire to become more intimately acquainted with the classical compositions of the great masters.

No notice appears to have been taken of this letter.

The programme-book of the first College Concert in memory of General Reid, given at Edinburgh University, Friday evening, February 12, 1841, contained—as humbly described by Professor Thomson—"brief notices of the music," and this, there is every reason to believe, was the first experiment of the kind in this country. The concert was so brilliant a success that it was repeated on the morning of the next day. The demand for tickets was altogether unexampled. On the Friday the audience numbered 1,300; "so great," says a newspaper of the time, "was the anticipation of the musical treat, that all the tickets were bought about a fortnight before the concert took place." Many applications for seats had to be refused, and hence the Senatus Academicus ordered the repetition as above mentioned. The programme was a long one, and although the performance commenced at seven o'clock, it was near twelve o'clock before the "entertainment," as it was called, concluded. The programme was divided into three parts, with two intervals, one of ten, the other of fifteen minutes. Besides overtures by Mendelssohn and Weber, Beethoven's C minor Symphony, and other instrumental music by Corelli, Bach, and Haydn—the last-named was represented by the "God save the Emperor" Variations from the Quartet (Op. 80, No. 2)—there were many vocal solos, duets, trios, quartets, also choruses. Among the violins of the orchestra is to be found the name, "A. Mackenzie," the father, we presume, of Sir Alexander Mackenzie, now Principal of the Royal Academy of Music. The orchestra consisted of fifty-six performers, the chorus of 126 members. The music was under the direction of Professor Thomson.

The analytical notes on Beethoven's C minor Symphony deal principally with structure. The form now known as first-movement, which our Professor prefers, however, to call symphonic, is clearly and succinctly described; he speaks of the Coda as consisting "of a few brilliant chords from the whole orchestra," a definition, however, which scarcely applies to the closing bars of the particular Allegro in question.

The story of the reception of this movement by the Philharmonic orchestra in 1814 is thus told by Professor Thomson:—

> The playing of the first two bars was followed by bursts of laughter, and a conviction that the author had at length become decidedly insane. One of the members, however, suggested that they should persevere, at least down to the double-bar. Accordingly they re-commenced, preserving their gravity as much as possible; but as the movement unfolded its beauties, their features gradually relaxed into approving smiles, and when the double-bar was attained, a burst of enthusiastic delight broke from every individual. The triumph of genius was never more complete.

The Finale is described as "the most magnificent orchestral movement that ever was written."

The programme opened with Mendelssohn's overture to "St. Paul," and the analyst calls attention to the difference between the instrumental introduction to an oratorio and to an opera. The latter kind is illustrated in the third part of the programme, which included the overture to Professor Thomson's "The Shadow on the Wall"—an opera which, in April, 1835, had a successful run of nearly fifty nights at the English Opera House—and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

Besides the words, there are helpful notes of comment, in some cases fairly lengthy, to all the vocal pieces of the programme; at the present day it is most rare to give anything beyond the words. Not only does the Professor point out the general character of the music in each case, but here and there calls attention to details of structure, harmony, or orchestration. For instance, he gives not only a clear outline of the "Hallelujah" chorus from the "Mount of Olives," but refers to certain chords and special passages. And then he contrasts this chorus with the "Hallelujah" in Handel's "Messiah"; while acknowledging the nobility of Beethoven's music, he yet feels that it "must yield in breadth of design, simplicity of detail, and sublimity of effect to the elder inspiration."

For the above brief description of the contents of this Reid programme-book, I am indebted to Professor F. Niecks, who kindly placed his copy at my disposal.

The next step is said to have been taken by John Ella at the Musical Union Matinées started in 1845. But in that same year something of the kind was attempted by the Beethoven Quartet Society (MM. Sivori, Sainton, Hill, and Rousselot), which gave a series of five concerts, or Meetings, as they were called, in the course of which all the master's quartets were given. Three quartets were played each time, excepting at the fourth concert, when there were four. The works were not performed in chronological, or rather opus order. The first programme will give a general idea of the scheme:—Op. 18, No. 1; Op. 59, No. 2 (in C); and Op. 127. One or more stanzas of poetry are followed—in the case of all the quartets—by the title and opening bars of each movement, after the manner of a thematic catalogue, and then come short comments: historical, æsthetic, and sometimes critical. At that time Nottebohm had not written his "Beethoveniana" nor Sir G. Grove his "Beethoven" article in the "Dictionary of Music and Musicians." The sources whence information respecting the works could then be obtained were not free from errors. We find, for instance, Beethoven's Quartet (Op. 18) described as composed in 1791 and published at Vienna in 1792. The programme of the fifth and last concert, which included specimens of the three styles of the composer (Op. 18, No. 5; Op. 59, No. 3, and Op. 132), closes with the following:

> Our task is ended.
> Let the echoes of the world be raised with one sound, and that > Honour to Beethoven.

Then came the programme-books of the New Philharmonic Society, which commenced its concerts in 1852, followed by those of the Crystal Palace (with which the name of Sir George Grove is so pleasantly associated), the Sacred Harmonic Society, and the Monday Popular Concerts, written by the late Mr. J. W. Davison. It was not, however, until 1869 that the Philharmonic Society followed suit. The books, with analyses, were first prepared by the late Sir G. A. Macfarren; afterwards by the late Dr. F. Hueffer; the analyst at the present time is Mr. Joseph Bennett. Analytical programme-books came more and more into vogue. Now they are provided for all orchestral, and most chamber concerts of any note.

The "Reid" programme-book of 1841 is, as already mentioned, the earliest, so far as this country is concerned; but it may prove interesting to refer, and somewhat in detail, to what would seem to be the earliest known attempt of the kind.

J. F. Reichardt (b. 1752, d. 1814) was a composer and critic of some note. In 1775, on the death of Agricola, he became Capellmeister at the Court of Frederick the Great. In 1783 he founded the so-called Concerts Spirituels at Berlin, performances of vocal and instrumental music which took place during the six weeks of Lent, every Tuesday evening, from five to eight o'clock. The subscription price for a lady and gentleman was two ducats. Non-subscribers paid one thaler for each concert. As Reichardt was Royal Capellmeister he was able to secure the best players for his band, also to engage the best vocalists, and amateurs belonging to the highest circles; travelling artists of any note, when possible, appeared at these concerts. The first series proved a great success, and a general wish was expressed that Reichardt would continue them year by year. In order to give beforehand to the public an idea of the spirit and contents of the pieces to be performed, Reichardt had books prepared with words of vocal pieces, and translations into German; and, further, a brief description of any works performed for the first time.

Let us take, for instance, the first concert held on March 11, 1783. An act from Leonardo Leo's oratorio "Cain and Abel" was given. Reichardt first speaks of Leo as "one of the noblest and greatest of Italian composers," and reminds his readers that Pergolesi, Piccinni, Sacchini, and Hasse studied under him. Our analyst admires Leo's profound knowledge of his art, the way in which he combines beauty and expression—qualities essentially Italian—with thoroughness worthy of a German. "Never before him," says he, "did any Italian write such great and noble music for the church and for the stage, and never, after him, has anyone produced writing of such charm. He is one of those rare geniuses who by their works enchant the age in which they flourish, and so overpower everything that every second-rate artist blindly imitates them."

In the overture to "Cain and Abel" the contrast is pointed out between the lofty and severe principal theme and the pleasant, melodious second theme; a short Pastorale (probably the opening section of the overture) is said "to indicate to a certain extent the character of the whole—i.e., it shows that the composition is not one of joyful, but of plaintive character." Then follow a few lines about the first chorus, than which our writer knows nothing "simpler, more noble and powerful." In the first aria the singer "certainly has no opportunity of displaying the agility of his throat," but the melody, "sung by a beautiful, sympathetic voice, is all the more touching." In the second aria the inner raging torment of envious Cain is said to be well depicted by the mode, by the heavy yet rapid progression of the vocal part, and by the full and quickly changing harmony. In the duet (i.e., the next number), for the most part in dialogue form, attention is called to "the differences of character which are admirably expressed by changes of mode, and by purer and more mixed melodic progressions."

At the third concert Jomelli's famous "Miserere" was performed. Reichardt acknowledges that Jomelli is "one of the most celebrated, most popular composers of this (i.e., the eighteenth) century," yet declares that "he has not thoroughly studied any one branch of his art." In riper years the composer is said to have laboured with considerable diligence, though never so much as to enable him to accompany his "often noble melodies with suitable, pure, natural harmonies, much less to enhance them, to strengthen their effect." Reichardt must have known the bad name attaching to comparisons, and yet he writes as follows:—

> The best way of perceiving Jomelli's shortcomings is to compare his music with that of Leo. The former proves in more striking manner than any other example in the history of the art, that the brightest genius, the most fiery imagination, even experience itself, will not compensate for lack of study.

In some form or other this thought has been expressed by many men. But seeing how many musicians endowed with a certain gift either forget or wilfully ignore it, the above reminder may, perhaps, even now be productive of good.

Another "Miserere," by Sarti, performed at the fourth concert, is noticed. The comments on the mixture of styles are interesting, but we must refrain from quotation. Reichardt calls attention "to the characteristic accompaniment for violas, 'cellos, and double-basses only, by which a sad, sombre colour is given to the music."

Reichardt, as we have seen above, compares Jomelli with Leo. At one concert, indeed, a comparison was given in a most practical manner. Leo's "Miserere" was first performed, and then followed by Bertoni's, whose aria was introduced by Gluck into his "Orphée." This was done "in order to show the difference in the setting and comprehension of the same text." At the head of the analytical comments to the two works Reichardt wrote:—

> The only aim of genuine sacred music can be to kindle a feeling of devotion, and this will only be attained by great simplicity of melody, by harmony nobly selected and worked out in imposing style, and by majestic movement.
> Italy, during the last century, abounded in excellent masters for sacred music; of this great period Leo was the last representative. Italy also had many excellent schools of singing; the composers were at the same time the teachers of youth born and destined for the art of music; and they so breathed into the performers the spirit of their works, that the whole nation was inspired with enthusiasm. Those masters exist no longer; the schools of singing have fallen into decay; art is despised by the people.
> Music passed, and most unsuitably, from the Church to the tragic stage, and suffered many changes. Soon it was discovered that it could adapt itself as well, if not better, to the comic stage. This was done, and now did music advance full speed. What happened to it everyone knows. From the comic stage, where, in its way, music was in fact highly developed, composers drew it back again into the Church; and one may go and listen, no matter where—in the churches, at the grand opera, at the comic opera, at Intermezzi—everywhere the same kind of music is to be heard. And now-a-days it is considered absolutely necessary for every composer to write, not only for the stage, but for all seven theatres of Naples or Venice.

At the sixth concert (April 15, 1783) a selection from a Passion of Metastasio, set to music by Reichardt, was performed. The following, signed by him, was printed in the book:—

As the music is from my pen, no commentary on it will be expected from me. And where would be the gain, if I tried to replace by words what perhaps I had not been able to express with sufficient strength in tones? My special reason for giving a composition of my own in place of one by an Italian composer, was my unwillingness to neglect this good and only opportunity of hearing and letting be heard a good performance of one of my works.

The writer certainly deserves praise for his frankness. Any composer, placed in such favourable circumstances, would doubtless have acted in like manner.

But I must bring this description of the Reichardt analytical comments to a close, and perhaps cannot do so better than by giving a curious Avis au lecteur printed on the programme-book of the first concert. It ran thus:—

Many critical connoisseurs have often remarked that loud clapping of the hands after a beautiful piece interfered with the pleasant impression, which they would so willingly prolong. To a genuine executive artist a bravo or bravissimo, uttered at the right moment, is more decisive and flattering than any amount of loud clapping at the end of a piece, clapping which frequently is produced by a brilliant close, cadence, or some showy passage. One may, therefore, make bold to ask a critical, appreciative audience whether a bravo call is not to be preferred to hand-clapping.

Reichardt's objection to clapping was thoroughly sensible; but he weakened his argument by a distinction with very small difference.

VICTORIAN MUSIC.

VII.—Orchestral Music.

It would not be easy to find a stronger contrast than that presented by the condition of opera, on the one hand, and orchestral music, on the other, during the Queen's reign. I have already told the story of the lyric stage—a story of wasted effort; of retrogression rather than advance; of public indifference, and almost unbroken disaster. That of the orchestra has now to be sketched, and truly is it a different tale.

Once more I go back to the year 1837 (taking the reader with me, if he will), observant of what was then happening on the orchestral platform. At that time there were four such platforms in London—namely, those of the Antient Concerts, the Philharmonic Society, the Societa Armonica, and the Society of British Musicians. All things considered, the number was not inadequate to the service demanded, but it must of course be understood that many individual concerts with orchestra were given in the course of the year. Upon these sporadic cases I do not propose to dwell, though they undoubtedly had a certain importance and value. Of the established societies for orchestral music, two occupied a limited field of activity—the Antient Concerts confining their selections to works by departed composers; the Society of British Musicians taking note only of home-made productions. The Philharmonic Society, on the other hand, was then, as now, free to choose from the entire repertory of art; equal liberty being enjoyed by the Societa Armonica. I propose to give a representative programme from the record of each society for 1837.

I have taken these specimen programmes quite at random, and there is much to be learned from them, especially as regards the points common to all. Each, for example, agrees with the rest in its evidence as to the limits of public taste and appreciation in the matter of orchestral music, and the proof is absolute that instrumental "bread" needed to be washed down by an unconscionable deal of vocal "sack." Of eighteen pieces in the Antient Concerts list only three are orchestral. In that of the Philharmonic, the instrumental works are six out of ten. The Societa Armonica shows five out of fourteen, and the Society of British Musicians six out of fourteen. The inference from these figures is clear as to the lack of robustness in the public appetite; but, on the other hand, the orchestral selections, though in a minority, are, as far as I know them, of unimpeachable character. Lovers of such music, it would appear, demanded the best.

Further interesting testimony with reference to the question just indicated arises out of the revival by the Philharmonic Society, in 1837, of Beethoven's Choral Symphony. That work was first performed, by the same Society, in 1825, and then so badly rendered that far-reaching consequences followed. Unable to comprehend it in hearing (the score was not then published), some of the critics attributed its apparent defects to the composer. One styled the work "the most extraordinary instance of great powers of mind and wonderful science wasted upon subjects infinitely beneath its strength." Another said it was "without intelligible design," and so on. These opinions, according to the late Dr. Gauntlett, "were copied from one publication into another, and, in consequence, that which had originated in misapprehension and ignorance was received as the dictate of sound criticism. A prejudice was excited against the work, and although the Symphonies, Nos. 7 and 8, were repeated and recognised as glorious specimens of the composer's matured powers of mind, few dared to set aside the verdict passed against the Symphony, No. 9." For the hostile critics in this case there is really something to be said. Their worst fault lay in giving a blind and hasty judgment. In effect they never heard the work, being witnesses only to a travesty which they had no means of recognising as such. They should have suspended judgment; they preferred to condemn out of hand, albeit the composer's name was Beethoven.

The performance of 1837 was directed by Moscheles, and in this connection we get our first glimpse of the modern conductor—or, rather, of his prototype—in England. From an enthusiastic writer in the Musical World I quote the following: "Mr. Moscheles conducted, and every attitude testified how completely he was absorbed in the beauty of the scene; how his spirit bowed down and worshipped the mighty genius of his master. For the way in which he led the band to draw out some few points, we thank him with feelings of gratitude and admiration; and we really think, now our enthusiasm has in some measure subsided, that, had we met him coming out of the concert-room, we should have knelt to him, and, through him, done homage to the memory of the magician whose mighty conception he had been so instrumental in developing." So might some perfervid worshipper of Richter or Mottl speak now of his idol. The more sober Times delivered itself to the same effect: "If music is ever to rise in this country to the dignity of an art, instead of being a mere plaything for indolence or affectation, it must be when such media as these are found for bringing forth its hidden treasures. The wonder of the evening was that a work which has appeared at every preceding attempt harsh, complicated, and unintelligible, proves in reality, when played as it should be, when the performers have caught some spark of the composer's fire, to be at once simple, grand, and impressive. It has established a truth which cannot be too widely circulated—that good music will always please the public if it is well played; and that orchestras in general are much more in fault than those who listen to them." How did those who listened to the Moscheles performance behave? A critic tells us that they bestowed enthusiastic applause and were absolutely overwhelmed with ecstasy and astonishment at the marvellous beauty of the work. "We never saw a more unanimous feeling of approbation, or one demonstrated with greater cordiality at any meeting of this society." It must be understood that the Philharmonic audience of that day was a very select body, but we have found them, twelve years before, accepting meekly the dictum of two or three writers who, being bound to say something magisterially, did so, and influenced the mass till an adequate rendering of the work made the crooked so straight and the rough places so plain that ordinary men could find their way to the goal of truth unaided. In this sketch of an event sixty years ago we may see a warning to the prevalent incompetence and the promise of a better time. It may even be that the true era of orchestral performance began in England with that memorable triumph of the greatest among orchestral works. But the development was not at all like that of Jonah's gourd.

Here let me say, in parenthesis, that we should be sure of our ground before turning the critics of the past into ridicule. The modern writer who quotes him with the amusing self-complacency of a superior person gains, at the best, a cheap triumph, and often no success at all. As well might a traveller at noontide ridicule the zig-zag progress of another who pursues his way by the faint light of early dawn. The critics of such works as the Choral Symphony wrote in the dark, with not even the printed page to guide them, and, as we have just seen, under the misleading impulse of bad performances. They were no more infallible than ourselves, and we, in a similar position, would be just as likely to make mistakes. Let us, in judging a predecessor, observe the golden rule, "Put yourself in his place."

London, even in 1837, was not England, and it is worth while to glance for a moment at the then condition of orchestral music in what we absurdly, but conveniently, call the provinces. Contemporary records show that orchestras were at work in some of the more important towns. Manchester then, as now, had concerts, with programmes differing in no respect from those of the metropolitan societies. In one, now before me, I find Spohr's first Symphony, a violin concerto, and the overture to "Egmont." The record of Liverpool at this period includes performances of Beethoven's second Symphony, the first of the overtures to the "Last Judgment," &c. In both towns a series of such concerts was given, but elsewhere very little appears to have been done save at choral concerts in which purely orchestral music was incidental. In Scotland, the Edinburgh Professional Society gave orchestral performances, and occasionally symphony and overture might be heard in Dublin, but the outlook was even more dreary in those countries than in England. Alike as to number and quality, concerts devoted to the highest forms of pure music were nothing to boast of and not much to tolerate.

It would be unfair in this connection to lay blame wholly on an undiscerning public. Amateurs at all periods are what their opportunities make them, and censure falls more justly perhaps upon conductors and performers. The English orchestra of sixty years ago, and for some time after, was an ill-disciplined and unruly body, into whose composition neither reverence for art nor enthusiasm in its cause appreciably entered. Perfunctory work was the rule, and the pleasures of insubordination were its reward, next after pecuniary recompense. The practical joker flourished—he is not yet wholly extinct—and the loud laugh went round at music which those who derided were incapable of understanding. Have we not heard how the Philharmonic orchestra made fun of Schubert's Symphony in C in the face of Mendelssohn, who introduced it to them? Save for the aggravation of its offence, this was a typical case. In effect, the English orchestra would not take art seriously. Music, to the mass of instrumentalists, was simply a means of living, and the least exertion necessary to get the living was all that they would put forth. Such, from what I have gathered at the lips of those who knew, and from what I, at one time, observed, was the English orchestra under the Tom Cookes, Henry Bishops, and George Smarts of early Victorian days. Could much better be expected? The autocracy of modern orchestral government was unknown. The orchestra itself had not long got rid of the régime which imposed upon it a "leader," who rapped his desk and waved his bow when he should have been playing, and a "conductor," who sat at a pianoforte and did Heaven knows what. Slow and uncertain was the evolution of the English conductor proper, albeit such men as Spohr, Mendelssohn, and Moscheles occasionally spurred it on by the force of example. And when he was evolved, the slovenliness and incompetence out of which he arose stuck to his garments like mud. A strong man was needed to set matters right—to enforce discipline, to secure at least an outward show of respect for art, and generally to transform chaos into an ordered realm. He came, in the person of Michael Costa, whose work and influence I shall take another opportunity of discussing.

ILLUSTRIOUS AMATEURS.

It is always interesting, if not always edifying or satisfactory, to trace the points of contact with music in the lives of eminent men who have had no formal or professional connection with the art—rulers, generals, statesmen, and littérateurs. There was Nero, for example, but perhaps the less said about him the better, inasmuch as he was perhaps the earliest and not the least conspicuous example of the complete divorce of artistic and humane instincts. Of musical monarchs, no doubt the most remarkable was Frederick the Great, whose achievements as an executant it is impossible for us to estimate, but whose claims to respectful consideration as a composer have been signally vindicated by the publication of his works, some of which were performed with great success a couple of years back by Mr. Frederick Griffith. Frederick the Great, however, was not the only ruler who combined military ability with a practical and intelligent interest in music. Cromwell, the great Protector, to whom, a priori, in view of his character and religious tendencies no one would ascribe such tastes, found in music one of his favourite recreations. His interest in the art, as we learn from Mr. C. H. Firth's article in the current number of the Cornhill, was not platonic; it was both keen and enlightened. According to a contemporary biographer, the Protector "was a great lover of music, and entertained the most skilful in that science in his pay and family." Thus it is on record that John Hingeston, a pupil of the illustrious Orlando Gibbons, was appointed organist to the Protector and music-master to his daughters at a salary of £100 per annum—a sum which, if not exactly lordly, was by no means insignificant when the usages of the time and the purchasing power of money 250 years ago are taken into account. Again, in April, 1654, when Cromwell entertained the Dutch ambassadors on the conclusion of peace with Holland, the ambassadors note that "the music played all the while we were at dinner," and after dinner the "Lord Protector had us into another room, where the Lady Protectress and others came to us, when we had also music, and voices and a psalm sung." Of all the anecdotes illustrative of the humanity of Cromwell there are few more pleasing than that related by Anthony Wood. Wood numbered among his acquaintances one James Quin, a senior student of Christ Church, Oxford, who had been turned out of his place by the Puritan visitors of the University. Quin had a bass voice, "very strong and exceeding trolling, but he wanted skill, and could scarce sing in consort. . . . Some of the great men of those times that loved music introduced him into the company of Oliver Cromwell, the Protector, who loved a good voice and instrumental music well. He heard him sing with great delight, liquored him with sack, and in conclusion said: 'Mr. Quin, you have done well; what shall I do for you?' To which Quin made answer, with great compliments, that his Highness would be pleased to restore him to his student's place, which he did accordingly, and so kept it to his dying day." The anecdote, if we assume Anthony Wood's estimate of Quin's accomplishments to be correct, may not lead us to form an exalted opinion of Cromwell's capacities as a musical critic, but at any rate it testifies agreeably to his kindliness of heart. Music, it may be added, played a prominent part in the festivities which accompanied the marriages of Cromwell's two daughters in 1657—so prominent, in fact, as to shock the susceptibilities of the more austere Puritans of that time. Thus, on the day after the wedding of Frances Cromwell to Robert Rich, the grandson of the Earl of Warwick, the feast was kept at Whitehall, "where," to quote from a contemporary account, "they had forty-eight violins and much mirth with frolics, besides mixt dancing (a thing heretofore accounted profane) till five of the clock yesterday morning." For the marriage of Mary Cromwell and Lord Fauconberg, which took place a week later at Hampton Court—where, by the way, there were two organs in the great hall—Andrew Marvell wrote two songs, one a dialogue between Endymion and Cynthia, in which Cromwell appears as Jove, and the other a pastoral, introducing the bride as Marina, the bridegroom as Damon, and the Protector as Menalcas.

Cromwell's liking for music is an excellent example of the occurrence of the unexpected, and it may be supplemented conversely by some even more startling instances of the entire absence of the musical instinct in persons in whom one might naturally have taken it for granted. No poet wrote more musical verse than the late laureate, and yet Lord Tennyson, though deeply versed in the technique of metre, had practically no knowledge of music at all, and was quite unable to discriminate between commonplace and inspired compositions. So, too, it is an open secret that Mr. Swinburne, perhaps the most perfect artificer of euphony in verse that ever lived, is equally destitute of an "ear for music." Conversely the late Mr. Robert Browning, who, with all his great gifts and his profound insight into humanity, was not exactly what one might call a melodious writer, had every claim to be considered an accomplished musical amateur. He was well versed in theory, and proved his devotion to the art not merely by some of his finest poems—"Abt Vogler," for example—but also by the assiduity of his attendance at the best concerts. Browning, in short, was, from the strictly musical point of view, perhaps the best equipped literary artist of the century, and certainly no man of letters in modern times has written of music or musicians with more accurate knowledge or sympathetic insight. George Eliot's love of music was deep and sincere, but it did not save her from perpetrating several ludicrous solecisms. Thackeray, judiciously applying the maxim "Glissez, mortels, n'appuyez pas," never laboured his allusions to music, and has enriched the literature of musical comedy with one of the most delightful parodies ever made of the conventional Italian libretto—

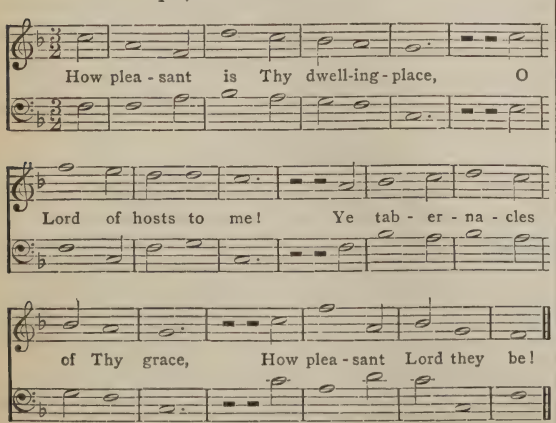
Nabucodonosore!



And this prompts us in conclusion to observe that in the main the attitude of literary men and women towards music has undergone a great amelioration within the last few years. It is no longer thought necessary by novelists to endow their heroines with "rich" contralto voices, or to display their ignorance of the rudiments of the art in a profusion of gratuitous references, in which gush and inaccuracy go hand in hand. Musical talent, as formerly depicted by writers of fiction, was entirely independent of training or education. The illustrious amateur was almost invariably self-taught. He or she never played set pieces, but their improvisations were of astounding brilliance and range of expression. They made you follow the babbling brook from its source in the hills to its home in the bosom of the mighty main. They spoke with the voices of the storm, they portrayed the eclipse, the avalanche, and the earthquake. But we have changed all that now-a-days. References to music in fiction are far more explicit and precise—a particular Lied by Brahms, a Lamoureux concert, a Bispham recital, or a special performance at Bayreuth. Indeed, a modern novel without a reference to Bayreuth will soon be a veritable rara avis in literature. Still, although the present tendency is rather in the direction of shoppiness, it is surely preferable to the slovenly effusiveness with which homage was formerly rendered to music by writers of fiction.

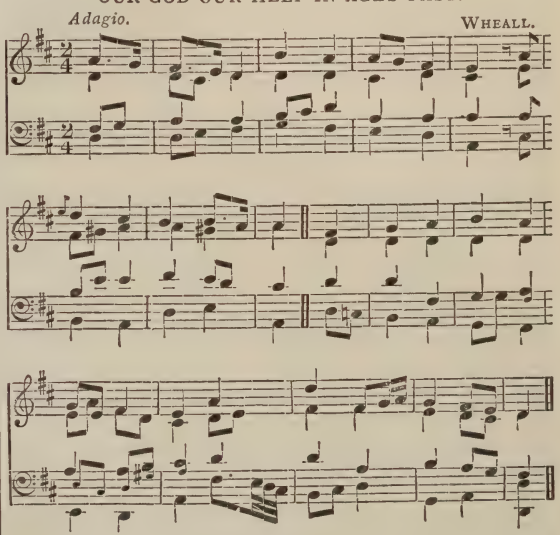
THE modest hymn-tune has provided a happy hunting-ground for editorial sport. We need not go far afield for a striking example, which may be found in the fine old tune "Bedford," composed by William Weale, a Bedford organist, who died in 1727—not 1745. It is almost impossible to say when "Bedford" first appeared. The tune is found in Matthew Wilkins's "Book of Psalmody," which Dr. Rimbault and others have erroneously attributed to 1699, five years before Mr. Wilkins was born! This book, unfortunately undated, is now very scarce. The copy before us, measuring 9 by 4½ inches, is printed on one side of the paper only, and bears the title: "A Book of Psalmody, | containing | some easy instructions for young beginners; to $\frac{ch}{w}$ is added | a select number of | Psalm-tunes, Hymns and Anthems, in 2, 3 and 4 parts. | Collected, printed, taught and sold by Matthew Wilkins, of Great Milton, near Thame, in Oxfordshire. | Engraved by Tho. Cross." Mr. Matthew Wilkins followed the joint occupations of butcher and psalmodist at the out-of-the-way village of Great Milton, where some of the Havergal family can trace their ancestors.

"BEDFORD" thus appears in Mr. Wilkins's book, page 24:—



PSALM $\frac{E}{Y}$ 84TH. BEDFORD TUNE. 2 VOC.

The syncopations, similar to those in Handel's "Verdi prati," at the end of each line will not escape notice, and, although it might be difficult to obtain them in ordinary congregational singing, they impart a stately character to the music which is quite in keeping with its old-world charm.

BUT who was the vandal that maltreated "Bedford" by changing its rhythm? The only answer seems to be that he was Mr. William Gardiner, a stocking manufacturer of Leicester, who has not a leg to stand upon in defence of his lame proceedings. In his "Sacred Melodies" (page 19), published in 1812, Gardiner prints the tune thus:—

"OUR GOD OUR HELP IN AGES PAST."

Gardiner gives the following miserable excuse for his unwarrantable alteration: "I have changed the key to D, and written it in common time, a measure that is more stately, and better accords with that solemn grandeur in which it is disposed to move." Unfortunately, as in "Hymns Ancient and Modern," Gardiner's rhythmic tinkerings have been followed in many tune-books. In some recent hymnals, however, the triple and far more beautiful form of the tune has been restored; but an extra passing note has invariably been introduced in the penultimate bar, with the result that the melody is made to go stepwise, from the subdominant, through the mediant, to the supertonic, instead of by skip. This unauthorised alteration of the melody causes a commonplace six-four chord on the dominant, which spoils the graceful cadence in the original. When will editors learn to show more respect to a composer's intentions?

THE Vienna Neue Freie Presse publishes an interesting letter from the pen of Herr Alwin von Beckerath, an intimate friend of Johannes Brahms, concerning the "Four Serious Songs" of that composer, which were said to have been suggested by the death of Clara Schumann. This allegation, however, is not borne out by the letter in question, which is directed to Dr. Hanslick, the Viennese critic, and runs as follows: "In May, 1896, Brahms, immediately after attending Frau Schumann's funeral at Bonn, came over to Honef, to the country house of my brother-in-law, Weyermann, where we got up a little private chamber music festival, in which Barth, of Hamburg, and a few Meiningen musicians took part. On the first day Brahms appeared much excited, but the lovely restful scenery around us, together with the domestic comforts afforded by the place, had a soothing effect upon him, and, instead of remaining as he had intended only for a day, he remained five. On the second day he told Barth that he had something new which he would like to show us in a quiet way. With beating hearts we accompanied him to a little-frequented room, which had a piano in it, and here he interpreted to us the 'Vier Ernste Gesänge' from the manuscript. He was himself much moved, to a degree indeed which I should not have thought possible. 'I have written these for my birthday,' he said. You will see, therefore, that this composition has no direct connection with the death of Clara Schumann. Besides these songs, he had brought with him some magnificent new organ preludes. We were all of us profoundly impressed, and a sad foreboding crept into my heart which, unfortunately, has proved but too well-founded."

A FAMILY of notable horn players, even unto the fifth generation. Such is the proud distinction of the Probin family of Birmingham, as recorded in "British Musical Biography" (reviewed in another column). The name of the first Mr. Probin is not forthcoming. It is sufficient to know that he was a horn player; but his son, Moses, born about 1782, "was the first to acquire a reputation" as a performer on that instrument. His son, Henry (1812-1885), was eminent as one of the "corni" at the Birmingham Festivals (including that of 1846) and elsewhere. Mr. Alfred Probin, son of Henry (born 1852), who began to study the family instrument at the age of eight, plays at the Three Choirs and Birmingham Festivals; moreover, a young son of his is preparing to uphold his ancestors' horn traditions as founded by his great-great-grandfather. Moses Probin was a virtuoso on the hand-horn. Commencing at the hour of five in the morning, he, with two of his sons, would practise trios for horns, and, probably, for hours. He was a man of devout mind and regular in his attendance at church. We learn that "on one occasion his rector, with whom he was very intimate, expressed a wish that he would give up horn playing and earn an honest (not a hornist) living!" With the spread of orchestral music in the churches, clergymen are now more tolerant, even towards "the brass." There are very few who would doubt the compatibility of horn playing with plain honesty. And if it came to the push, might not a horn player become honest by hook or by crook?

SEVENTY-THREE years ago "A Dictionary of Musicians" appeared in two volumes. Whatever the merits of that biographical work, it was not a model of accuracy. One of its greatest achievements in that direction was the sorrowful information that Samuel Wesley "died about the year 1815." As that melancholy event did not occur until the year 1837, the sad news, promulgated in 1824, drew from that presumably defunct but amusing musician a very natural protest, but no tears. Wesley, using The Times as his mouthpiece, gravely said that the publishers (of the "Dictionary") "would still further oblige and illuminate the world by a minute detail of my funeral, with the names of the eye-witnesses, and a geometrical description of my present place of sepulture." This he followed by giving the number and street of his "living residence." As may readily be imagined, Wesley made great fun out of his having been thus prematurely consigned to the tomb. Mirabile dictu, his favourite tune was "Down among the dead men."

CELEBRATIONS on a large scale will be going forward during the next few months at Bergamo, in honour of the birth-centenary of its most illustrious son, Gaetano Donizetti. A statue by the Neapolitan sculptor, Francesco Jerace, representing the composer in the act of writing a melody suggested to him by the muse Melopeia, will be unveiled on the 15th inst. A series of Donizetti's operas will be given at the theatre bearing his name, and a number of concert performances will take place, in which Madame Melba, Teresina Tua, Miss Fanny Davies, Dr. Joachim, and Signor Piatti are announced to take part. To the Exhibition, held in connection with the event, Paris and Vienna, the two capitals in which the composer resided by preference, have largely contributed, while amateurs all over Europe have sent Donizetti relics innumerable. Amongst the exhibits which will certainly attract attention is an arrangement for two violins of the Finale of "La Favorita," by Richard Wagner; one of the dumb but eloquent witnesses of the Bayreuth master's struggle for existence during his early sojourn in Paris. There are also here the manuscripts of three comic operas not mentioned by Donizetti's biographers; one, entitled "Dalinda," another, "Adelaïde," written to Italian librettos, and a third, "Ne m'oubliez pas," to a French libretto. In addition to the musical celebrations, athletic and other sports are to be held, and as the actual centenary does not occur until November 29 some further attractions will probably have to be thought of to keep up the enthusiasm till then.

MRS. NEWEALTH.—"And how is my daughter getting on with her music, professor?"

PROFESSOR DA CAPO.—"Remarkably well. The only difficulty I find is in making her observe the rests."

MRS. N.—"Oh! but she must. She has plenty of time!"

"Mr. Punch" has furnished us in the above extract with a text upon which we may offer a few remarks upon time. With all due respect to our humorous contemporary, there is not a wealth of Miss Newealths in regard to "plenty of time," or a plentiful knowledge of it. The ordinary schoolgirl is a rhythmless creature. Even when she can be persuaded to count her time, she more often counts to her playing than plays to her counting. It is greatly to be feared that the cultivation of rhythm is far too much neglected in musical education. In the plethora of examinations, so characteristic a feature of our times, the subject receives very little attention. Such a time-question, in a musical examination, as "How many semidemisemiquavers are there in a double-dotted crotchet?" is as futile as it is idiotic. The power to feel time—the natural throb of its rhythmic pulsation — should be pleasantly but thoroughly instilled into the minds of even the youngest pupils until it becomes a part of their very nature. Technique is good, but it should not hold the first place. The ability to read music and to play with rhythmic accuracy are primary essentials: the rest will come in time.

MUSICAL examiners must often be hard pushed in finding new questioning material for the many candidates who, like the tribes, "go up." In looking through a collection of old letters on musical subjects the other day, we came across the following questions seriously addressed to a well-known English antiquarian musician by a foreign musical historian. These questions, which are couched somewhat in riddle phraseology, are as follows: (1) "What is the difference between a fagotto and a bassoon?" (2) "What is the difference between a *horn*pipe and a *bag*pipe?" Here is an opportunity for an examiner to make his mark and an examinee to score his (or her) marks, in respectively (and respectfully) setting and answering such passable interrogatories.

The introduction of the pianissimo commencement of the chorus "For unto us" is usually attributed to the late Sir Michael Costa; but, as we propose to show, in error. In a detailed and shrewdly critical account of the Musical Festival held in Westminster Abbey, June and July, 1834, there appears the following in reference to the performance of that chorus:

"For unto us a Child is born" was performed with a precision that cannot be surpassed. But to begin this piano, and thus to continue to the word "Wonderful!" is, we submit, a palpable mistake, and ought not to be heedlessly drawn into a precedent. The joy is, that "a Saviour is born"—a joy not to be proclaimed in a whisper, not to be spoken of aside, but to be announced in the manner that all "good tidings" are, with a voice lifted up with strength—without fear! That it is a prophecy is true, but the advent it predicts is not meant as a secret, it is intended that all the world shall hear of it. The words "Wonderful!" "Counsellor!" are mere names, to be distinctly enunciated, no doubt, as Handel intended; but is there any comparison between the joy at the birth of a child—the Deliverer of Mankind!—and the pleasure felt on his receiving an appellation? We may be told something about musical effect. We are ready to meet the defence on even this ground. But is sense to be sacrificed to sound? The genius of the Dunciad answers in the affirmative: nevertheless, will the public, in nearly the middle of the nineteenth century, confirm the decision?

At the time of this Festival Costa had only been in England for five years and he had not conducted an oratorio. It is very probable that he was present at Westminster Abbey on the occasion above referred to. If so, what more probable than that he should consider this "bated breath" to be the traditional method of singing "For unto us"? Sir George Smart conducted, and he is often quoted as having imbibed the Handel traditions from Joah Bates; but the above report would lead us to infer that the ridiculous pianissimo was a tradition of Smart's own invention.

In connection with the 1834 Musical Festival at Westminster Abbey, it is interesting to find in the rank and file of the performers the names of those who afterwards became famous. Thus, amongst the tenor players in the orchestra are "W. S. Bennett" (who, of course, is Sterndale Bennett), then a youth of eighteen, and W. Dorrell, who has so recently been removed by death, neither of whom developed their viola propensities in after years. In the semi-chorus was "Miss Dickens," a sister of Charles Dickens. Amongst the boy sopranos were E. T. Chipp (Chapel Royal), James Coward (Westminster Abbey), John Hopkins (St. Paul's, now of Rochester), and J. L. Hopkins (Westminster Abbey). The altos (who were all males) included two distinguished organists, Henry Smart, then of Blackburn, and W. Spark, then of Exeter. The list of the chorus-basses records the names of John Hullah, Charles Lucas, and G. A. Macfarren—both the last-named subsequently becoming Principals of the Royal Academy of Music—and Mr. Kellow J. Pye. No less than five members of the Novello family took part. Vincent, the father, was one of the organists; Clara, his daughter, was a solo soprano; Francis, his brother, and Joseph Alfred and Edward Petre, his sons, were basses in the chorus.

"Above all," says a standard author on voice production and preservation, "avoid highly spiced meats, sausages, and the like." But we hear of a new tenor, possessing a most brilliant, flexible, and sympathetic voice, who has just been "discovered" at a desk in the office of his father, one of the leading sausage manufacturers of Carlsruhe! This young man, Herr Heinrich Hensel, recently sang on trial at the Freiburg Stadt-Theater, and we learn that he was at once permanently engaged by the impresario who discovered him. It may perhaps be said, in vindication of the authority we have quoted, that Herr Hensel carefully abstained from any consumption of the paternal produce.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

Surely it is only self-respect, regard for art, and consideration for the nerves of others which keep many a poor, struggling, under-paid professor of music from going about with a piano-organ. The police court, that great revealer of social phenomena, has lately made known to us an "organ-king," whose royalty rests upon his ownership of forty instruments of torture. Such a potentate could not escape the interviewer, and, under pressure of "the question ordinary and extraordinary," his Majesty confessed that the hirers of his instruments could each make from 10s. to £1 a day. He himself charged only 1s. 8d. a day, nevertheless he could "wear diamond rings and live in good style." I do not doubt it, for it is a fact, however extraordinary it may seem, that the piano-organ has patrons who are above a pavement dance. A few doors from me, on the right, lives a painter of repute, and at the same distance on the left dwells a florist. These persons welcome the piano-organ, which for several hours per day, on and off, grinds before their doors and drives me nearly mad. No wonder that the grinder flourishes, while his chief wears diamond rings and lives in good style. But how do I come off? With harassed nerves, and hindered work, from which I cannot save myself except at the cost of still worse personal annoyance and of probable outlay. The freedom of this free country seems to me partial.

Some time ago I told in this column, on the authority of a correspondent, how the ruling powers of Chichester Cathedral had resolved to simplify their musical service at the expense of its attractiveness and artistic value. My correspondent now writes: "A strong protest was made by 400 clergy and laity, with the result that the Chapter announced, on August 3, that the order of May 3 was to be interpreted as an instruction to avoid anthems and services of excessive length. The services will therefore continue as before, only one or two anthems and one service being objected to." Very good, and I congratulate the Chapter upon the courage which enabled them to "back down." The taboo will of course be extended to long sermons.

The Western Mail of the 10th ult. contained a letter from Mr. D. Davies, conductor of the Merthyr Choral Society, who, I understand, sent it also to the Daily Telegraph. The London journal does not appear to have inserted the communication; for which I am sorry, as it would have afforded English readers both amusement and instruction. Let me explain that Mr. Davies and his choir appeared at the recent Eisteddfod in Newport, taking part in the chief choral contest. They were not successful in winning a prize, and hence a good deal of angry feeling, much protest, and considerable abuse. In the letter to which reference has been made Mr. Davies calls in question the judgment of the adjudicators—Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Mr. Walter Macfarren, and Mr. Emlyn Evans—and shows himself particularly wroth with the special correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, by whom the verdict was strenuously upheld, as the only one possible consistent with the canons of good choral singing.

In the case of an unsuccessful choir we must not expect superhuman virtue. Defeat is naturally mortifying, especially when the vanquished have frequently been victorious, and are supported by a public opinion which they can hardly be expected to regard as unenlightened. For my own part, I am prepared to make a large allowance under such circumstances, and should not think of treating seriously even a strong manifestation of annoyance. Especially is this the way to deal with Welsh choirs and conductors, who are super-sensitive, and often take a beating very badly. As a rule, however, the storm quickly subsides, and no particular harm is done. The Merthyr choir and its conductor, on the other hand, seem bent on figuring as a conspicuous exception. They suffered defeat last year at Llandudno, and on that occasion were, as now, vigorous in protest. Not only so, but, in view of an Eisteddfod held in connection with the Cardiff Exhibition, they refused to take part unless the adjudicators were an entirely different body from that which acted at Llandudno. The committee properly declined to be dictated to in their choice of judges, and the aggrieved choir held aloof. At Newport, recently, there being a fresh set of adjudicators, they condescended to appear; they were again beaten, and now the Welsh welkin rings with their cries.

The key to this strange behaviour may perhaps be found in Mr. Davies's letter, from which it appears that he goes forth to war assured of deserving victory. At Llandudno, he tells us, a "faddistical award" deprived his choir of their "rights"—"robbed us of our due." As to Newport, he says, "I feel I have been deprived of my right." With such a belief as this in the conductor's mind, it is no wonder that he rages around and trails his coat through the musical Donnybrook.

Nevertheless, Mr. Davies feels that his claims should not rest simply upon his own conviction of their justice. This was the case last year, when the Merthyr people tried to make capital out of the fact that the adjudicators gave no detailed reasons for their decision. At Newport, the judges were equally reticent, doubtless for good reasons; but the Merthyr conductor and his friends changed their tactics. We heard no more of wanting reasons for the verdict, but it was proclaimed that, as Mr. Davies put it, "my choir has been judged by a standard which is a false one." There is a Welsh standard it seems. "The Cymry are a fiery and impulsive nation, and it is that touch of fire and dash and emotionalism which makes their singing go straight to the hearts of the people." And there is an English standard, to which, I suppose, Mr. Davies refers when he speaks of a "mechanical so-much-per-yard style," and a "clothes-prop style," whatever that may mean. I am not going to enter into this battle of the standards on the present occasion, but simply wish to point out that the cry now started against English adjudicators on the ground that they judge by a standard not applicable to Wales comes rather late in the day. English adjudicators have acted at Eisteddfodau on many occasions, and have judged competitors by what they regard as the true canons of art; but only when Merthyr has suffered two consecutive defeats are we told that judges from over the border are incompetent to deal justly with Welsh singing. Did Mr. Davies discover this after the Newport verdict, or did he know it when he agreed to appear before Sir A. C. Mackenzie and Mr. Macfarren?

A writer in the Western Mail touches this matter so forcibly that I cannot do better than quote him: "If there be this difference between the Welsh and English schools of music, why procure English adjudicators, knowing their decisions can only be considered fair from an English standpoint? And now, when their adjudication is deliberately invited, can we honestly cavil at it? Does it show Welsh taste up in an enviable light when the whole Principality censures the decisions of the gentlemen imported on purpose to decide? If Wales be populated exclusively by expert musical critics (as this rush of censorious Welshmen upon the Newport judges would imply), where was the need of going outside the Principality at all?" Precisely.

I do not want to use harsh terms, but I must say that this talk about a Welsh standard and an English standard is simply nonsense, vamped up for the purpose of a battle-cry. Many Welsh choirs are not distinguishable from English societies when they sing, and if there be anything distinctive in others it is generally the excitability and lack of restraint which result in false intonation, sometimes in getting completely off the key. Good singing is the same all the world over, and "national characteristics" are to be condemned, not praised, when they stand in its way.

An American writer has taken upon himself to defend "gush" in musical literature. In the course of a long article he says:—

> The prevailing literature of music is positively brackish with didacticism. Salt there is an abundance, sparkling attic sort of wit, bitter sea-salt of cynic criticism, but where is the bubbling fountain of gushing crystal? Yes, gush; musical literature should be gushing. The musician who has no gush in him is no musician; he is a machine. If human blood had not the red tincture of iron it would be worthless as blood—that is, for human beings; it might serve the turn of a fish; and so a musician must have within him the glow of rapture, and if he have merely a digital facility he had better take to watch-making rather than piano-playing. Technical knowledge, scientific instruction, and all the grades of poetic musing are valuable if they meet the requirements of good literature; but in the very centre of this garden of multiform plants, let there be a fresh and irrepressible fountain of emotional enthusiasm. The fountain springs from unknown depths in the earth, and enthusiasm springs from the mysterious abysses of our spiritual life.

A story comes from Rome to the effect that when the City Band in the Piazza Colonna played the Funeral March in "Götterdämmerung" the people hissed, hooted, and cried: "Down with German music! We want Italian music!" I was myself witness to a similar demonstration when in Venice on the occasion of the German Emperor's visit. The Municipal Band, playing in St. Mark's Square, under the windows of the Royal Palace, had not got far with a Wagnerian selection, chosen out of compliment to the Imperial guest, before the crowd intervened with all manner of uncouth noises, completely drowning the music. After a show of resistance to popular taste, the bandmaster gave in, and was applauded accordingly. Joseph Bennett.

CHURCH MUSIC.

The Yorkshire Herald, in a little article on "Organ Accompaniment," observes:

Experience of recent festival services in connection with the public thanksgiving points once more to the fine effect which is within the reach of most organists on such occasions, by adding trumpets, trombones, and drums to the organ accompaniment. Even a quartet of brass, says The Musical Times, makes a remarkable increase of brightness, and there are few churches which could not command the services of, say, two cornets and two trombones, or a similar combination, to supply the vivid points of colour which serve to distinguish the festal from an ordinary day. Some music has already been scored for this purpose, but every organist should be competent to add brass parts to any anthems or canticles which have not been so arranged. If judiciously done, the result is better than that of a scratch orchestra. Strings must be very well played, and strong in numbers, to be effective in a church, while the wood-wind is not at all satisfactory with the organ. Questions of space and expense usually prohibit the employment of a competent full professional orchestra, and the organ is the best substitute for this, saving for one thing lacking—namely, dynamic force. Brass and percussion admirably supply the want.

A question of judgment as to the kind of oratorio or choral work best suited for Church purposes has naturally arisen, as a result of the frequent renderings of such works in Cathedrals and other churches. Of course, outside the question of general use, given days have specially appropriate choral works, "Elijah" being an oratorio specially suited for Ascension Day and "St. Paul" has its own special place on St. Paul's Day. Certain oratorios, such as Handel's "Messiah" and Gounod's "Redemption," may be well divided into several parts, in view of special portions being assigned to certain of the high festivals of the Church. For harvest and other festivals of general human interest, such works as Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Spohr's "God, Thou art great," are well adapted. The shorter choral works present advantages upon occasions when complete choral services are properly required, and when the long oratorio or anthem would, perhaps, lead attention away from the other portions of the service.

The Church Orchestral Society is doing much good work, directly and indirectly. It has already aided at many impressive services, and it is evidently encouraging by example orchestral use in church, and thereby is also inducing composers of church music to score their service settings with orchestral accompaniments. A library of music is being steadily formed by the society and its many friends, consisting of service music, anthems, and hymn tunes scored with accompaniments for orchestra, together with oratorios and other sacred choral works and pieces for orchestra, suitable for use in church.

The recent festival services of the Exeter Diocesan Choral Association at the Cathedral city, Devonport and Tor, were attended with good results. The plan of singing the same well-prepared service form at several centres of the diocese is an excellent one; and the Exeter festival book is one always marked by sound judgment and painstaking care in the matter of selection. To Mr. T. Roylands Smith, the choirmaster; Dr. Wood, the Cathedral organist; and to the committee of management warm praise is due for their excellent and valuable labour in connection with this work.

Signs have not been wanting of late which point to an increased use in church of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," which is essentially a church oratorio. It may be a popularity, long delayed, is awaiting "St. Paul," which will prove to be only second to that so promptly achieved by "Elijah," the great modern dramatic oratorio. These two noble musical sermons are never heard to greater advantage and under more appropriate conditions than in church upon an occasion when is commemorated some triumph of the Faith, some acknowledgment of religious heroism.

At the recent opening of a new organ, the Dean of Peterborough observed in the course of his sermon that the hearts of those present were full of thanksgiving and joy, in the thought that music was now resuming its proper position and taking its right share in the worship of the Church of England. Such acceptable words form an important "official"—if one may use the word—recognition of the value of Church music.

ORGAN MUSIC.

There are still old-fashioned, not to say timid people, who do not express ecstatic emotion upon reading such formidable information as is conveyed in a description of the grand new instrument for the beautiful old Parish Church of St. Mary, Warwick, in the words: "This organ will, when completed, rank as the most powerful Parish Church instrument in the country." The builder of the instrument is no less a master of organ tone production than Mr. Hope-Jones, who introduces into the Warwick organ his new method of tone production, mechanically consisting "of a soft valve, moved by a motor and governed by a resonator"; and it is to this medium he assigns the work of securing exceptionally impressive and dignified tone qualities. The Warwick organ, when it is finished, will contain some thirty-eight sounding stops, with a tremulant for stops on light wind pressure, twenty-one coupling movements, and some thirty-six piston and pedal mechanisms of combination. The pedal organ, with an open thirty-two feet register, is ample, and has a judicious selection of stops. The double touch, a valuable acquisition, is one of the features of a well thought out scheme, and is applied to three of the manuals.

The thirty-seventh of a monthly series of recitals recently given at the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, by the organist, Mr. Rudolph Loman, had a brief but interesting programme, including a Marche Héroïque by Saint-Saëns, and that splendid illustration of organ power, Bach's Toccata in D minor, so-called "Doric." In accordance with a common practice, violin solos with organ accompaniment were also included, an Andante Religioso by Thomé being a marked feature in this connection.

Dr. W. Reynolds, the organist of St. Michael's, Cornhill, has issued in collective form the programmes of a century of organ recitals lately given at his church. These interesting schemes show the well-judged perseverance of Dr. Reynolds in sustaining a now greatly esteemed City institution—the mid-day organ recital.

Compositions by E. T. Chipp, Smart, B. Jackson, Sir A. C. Mackenzie, C. Vincent, E. J. Hopkins, C. W. Pearce, E. H. Lemare, W. Wolstenholme, and Sir John Stainer made up an excellent programme, played by Mr. H. Riding recently at Chigwell Church. In his analytical programme, Mr. Riding writes of his selected pieces "as flowers plucked at random from a garden of almost boundless extent, and of luxuriance unexampled in any other country or age." This enthusiastic praise expresses a handsome appreciation of our modern English organ music.

The new organ now being erected for Bangor Cathedral by the old-established and well-esteemed firm, Messrs. W. Hill and Son, will be of large size, with an admirable specification, probably drawn up under the direction of the able organist, Mr. T. Westlake Morgan. The instrument will have four manuals and pedal, with sixty-four sounding stops, thirteen couplers, with numerous combination movements. The pitch will be the normal diapason—a wise arrangement. The instrument altogether promises to be one of our most notable Cathedral organs.

Among other points of interest in Mr. Stocks's recently issued little history of the Dulwich College organ, one is an extract from a report concerning the restoration of the chapel music towards the close of the seventeenth century, in which it appears that "the service by statute is appointed to be performed, as near as may be, to ye forme of ye King's Chapell or St. Peter's, Westminster." Another is the account of Bernard Smith's old organ. We also find statements of interest anent some organists of the period and sundry old English organ-builders. Father Smith, it appears, enjoyed the use of apartments at Whitehall, marked in an old plan as "The Organ-builder's Workhouse."

JUBILEE MUSIC IN NEW ZEALAND.

(From various Correspondents.)

No apology is needed for inserting the following reports of musical doings in so enterprising a colony as New Zealand, where, we are glad to learn, music is being assiduously cultivated by many earnest and devoted workers in that far away portion of Greater Britain. The account from Palmerston North is specially interesting as showing what may be done by zealous lovers of the art. May the music-loving New Zealanders go on and prosper in their enthusiasm, which is deserving of all encouragement and commendation.

Wellington.

On June 18 a Jubilee service was held in St. Paul's Pro-Cathedral. The choir was augmented by 200 voices from the Festival Choral Society and a small orchestra supplemented the organ. Mr. R. Parker, organist of St. Paul's, conducted, and Dr. Kingston Fyffe presided at the organ. The music included Handel's "Occasional" Overture, "Zadok the Priest," and Hallelujah chorus ("Messiah"), Parker's "O Lord our Governor," and Mackenzie's Benedictus for violin, played by Mr. MacDuff Boyd.

St. Peter's Church was crowded at both services on Ascension Day, and many were unable to obtain admission. The music at the evening service included Handel's "The King shall rejoice" and Mr. Trimnell's setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F. After the thanksgiving a solemn Te Deum in D, by the same composer, was rendered with fine effect, and the National Anthem was sung as a recessional. Mr. T. Tallis Trimnell, who was formerly well-known in England, played Weber's "Jubilee" Overture on the organ as a concluding voluntary.

On June 20 Mr. W. A. Reid gave an organ recital at St. Luke's Church and played with great ability the following programme: "Occasional" Overture (Handel), "Coronation March" (Meyerbeer), "Coronation March" (Lesueur), Handel's "Zadok the Priest" and "The King shall rejoice," the Hallelujah chorus from "The Messiah," and "God save the Queen," with variations (Adolphe Hesse). Special services were held at all the churches throughout the city on Accession day.

On June 17 Mr. Maughan Barnett's musical society gave a most successful concert at the Opera House, in commemoration of our Queen's long reign. The first part consisted of Cowen's "Song of Thanksgiving" and Beethoven's E flat Pianoforte Concerto, the solo in the latter work being played by Mr. Maughan Barnett and conducted by Mr. Lawrence Watkins. The second part consisted of an original cantata, entitled "A Song of Empire," the words by Mr. Arthur H. Adams, the music by Mr. Maughan Barnett. The cantata, which is a favourable example of colonial talent, was enthusiastically received. The chorus numbered 220 and the orchestra thirty-five performers. Mr. M. Barnett conducted.

Christchurch.

Warmest loyalty characterised the Christchurch celebration of the Queen's Jubilee commemoration, and special services were held in all the churches on Sunday, June 20. At the Cathedral, which both morning and evening was filled to overflowing, the National Anthem was sung at each service; also a Jubilee hymn, written by Archdeacon Harper. Handel's Coronation anthem, "Zadok the Priest," was splendidly sung, and the organist, Mr. G. F. Tendall, played the Hallelujah chorus. At half-past eleven on the night of Tuesday, June 22, corresponding with the hour of twelve noon in London, a short service was held in the Cathedral, when, in addition to the National Anthem, the Te Deum was sung to the music of Stanford in B flat. Handel's "Zadok the Priest" was again performed.

At the Opera House on Monday, June 21, the Christchurch Musical Union gave Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," together with a short programme of patriotic music, in the presence of an immense audience. Ringing cheers for the Queen followed the singing of the National Anthem, "Rule, Britannia," also evoking great enthusiasm.

Palmerston North.

On June 24 Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was performed as a Thanksgiving Service in connection with the celebration of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee, in All Saints' Church. The choir was augmented for the occasion by a number of voices from other choirs in the town. A strong orchestra also assisted. Mr. T. Tallis Trimnell, the well-known composer and organist of St. Peter's, Wellington, presided at the organ and rendered valuable assistance. Mr. John Hill, of Wellington, who has recently returned to the colony after studying for some years at the Leipzig Conservatorium, undertook the tenor solos and received warm praise for his finished and artistic style. The other solos were taken by members of the choir, and the whole performance reflected much credit upon the organist and choirmaster of the church, Mr. Alfred Drew.

The point worthy of emphasis about this performance is that the work was given in a town situated in a district which, only a few years ago, was covered by a primitive forest, but which now numbers amongst its residents many capable musicians, who show their love for the works of the great masters by devoting much time to their study and production. The fact that Mendelssohn's noble work was given as a Thanksgiving Service in connection with Her Majesty's Jubilee in an Anglican Church is probably in itself quite a unique event—at any rate, in the colonies.

DANBY—PAXTON—WEBBE.

These eminent, and typically English glee composers—John Danby (1757-1798), Stephen Paxton (1735-1787), and Samuel Webbe (1740-1816)—are buried in Old St. Pancras churchyard, which is situated behind St. Pancras railway station. The ravages of time, if not the weather, have obliterated the inscriptions on the tombs of Danby and Paxton, while Webbe's tombstone has disappeared. Mainly through the suggestion of Mr. David Baptie, of Glasgow, aided by the practical efforts of Mr. J. Spencer Curwen, the two decayed inscriptions have been made legible. A new handsome granite obelisk has also been erected, near his supposed resting-place, to Webbe, bearing the inscription, "Samuel Webbe, died March 25, 1816, in his 76th year," followed by the opening strain of his fine glee, "Thy voice, O harmony, is divine." The unveiling of the monument took place on July 24, Mr. George Riseley, conductor of the Bristol Madrigal Society and organist of Bristol Cathedral, with much appropriateness, performing the ceremony.

Mr. Riseley, after expressing the pleasure he had in performing the ceremony entrusted to him, and to join in doing honour to the memory of the three men they were commemorating, said in the course of an interesting and thoughtful address: "Webbe, Paxton, and Danby lived in the latter part of the eighteenth century, and were accomplished musicians; two I am proud to claim as brother organists, but all three are best known as eminent in one particular form of music—the purely English art of glee writing. In 1741 (when Webbe was only one year old) the celebrated and evergreen Madrigal Society was founded in London, which to this day offers prizes for the composition of madrigals. This society, said to be the oldest in Europe, at first consisted of sixteen members, who were persons belonging to Cathedral choirs, or those 'vouched for by two or more members of the society as being capable of singing their parts in concert, both in time and tune,' and a strict examination test was imposed. Afterwards, we are told by Sir John Hawkins (himself one of the earliest members), it was largely reinforced by 'mechanics and weavers from Spitalfields, and others who were well versed in the practice of Psalmody.' These ardent and enthusiastic musicians were in the habit of meeting weekly, and singing till half-past ten at night, when they had to cease, 'unless some of the members shall be cheerfully incited to sing catches,' in which case their privileges were extended till eleven o'clock. After this (though we may sympathise with the delinquents) we are not surprised to find another rule, which enacted that 'any member eating his supper, or a part thereof, during practice time, was to forfeit sixpence, to be applied to buying ruled paper.' (Laughter.) What influence this society exercised over the rising young musicians of the day we can now scarcely estimate, but it must have been very considerable. At all events, the practice of the old madrigal, with its 'linked sweetness long drawn out,' led to a somewhat different style of composition, and in 1762 another society was started, called 'The Noblemen and Gentlemen's Catch Club,' for the encouragement of the composition and performance of canons, catches, and glees. This was followed twenty-five years later by the Glee Club, for the singing of glees and canons after dinner. Both these societies offered prizes for the composition of glees and catches, and to their fostering care we owe 'many a gem of purest ray serene.' (Hear, hear.) For many years the names of Webbe, Paxton, and Danby figured in the list of prize-takers in these compositions; Webbe having gained twenty-seven prize medals in all. The lives of these three men were comparatively uneventful. Samuel Webbe was born in Minorca in 1740, but his family soon removed to London. On the sudden death of his father, who was a Government official, the little Samuel, then a child of eleven, was apprenticed to a cabinet maker. The ruling passion was, however, too strong for him, and on the expiration of his time he began the study of music under Barbandt, organist of the Bavarian Ambassador's chapel. He had found his vocation, and from 1763 devoted the greater part of his time to unaccompanied vocal music. He became organist of the chapel of the Sardinian Embassy, no doubt through the influence of his master, Barbandt. In 1784 he became secretary to the Catch Club. In 1787 he was appointed librarian to the newly established Glee Club, and for it he composed his celebrated glee, 'Glorious Apollo,' with which every meeting thenceforward began. He himself published nine books of glees, to say nothing of songs; and many of his glees and canons are published in Warren's collection. A large number of these are no longer heard, but some will maintain their position as long as a taste for this style of music exists. Webbe lived respected and beloved, happy in his work, and a benefactor to posterity. He died at the age of seventy-six, in the year 1816, and was buried here. William Linley wrote an ode upon his death, for the best setting of which a prize was offered; there were seven competitors, the successful one being C. S. Evans.

"Before closing this account of Webbe's life I should like to add a few words on an interesting incident which recently came under my notice. By the courtesy of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. I was permitted to spend a few hours last Saturday morning looking through the fine collection of glees contained in their library. Here I found an MS. volume of compositions by Webbe, containing five masses, two requiems, three motets, a Magnificat in F, and several collects. Inside the cover Vincent Novello has written the following remarks: 'This volume contains a curious and unique collection of manuscripts in the handwriting of Mr. Webbe, senior, the celebrated glee composer, and the organist for many years at the Sardinian Ambassador's chapel, near Lincoln's Inn Fields. There are also a few autograph compositions by his son, who was likewise an organist, and an excellent musician. He was a much greater performer than his estimable father, and it is recorded to his honour, that when Haydn was in this country, he frequently went to hear young Webbe play the service at the Bavarian Chapel in Warwick Street, Golden Square, where Mr. Webbe, junior, was for many years employed as organist and director of the choir. I have myself heard him perform some of Haydn's charming compositions on that organ, in a most delightful and masterly manner. He was likewise a very tasteful performer on the violoncello, besides being a very skilful contrapuntist and musicianlike composer. I have had great pleasure in offering a tribute of respect to the father and the son (with both of whom I enjoyed the advantage and gratification of being intimately acquainted at the early part of my professional career), by bringing out a new edition of their works, which I have endeavoured to render as still more generally useful in small choirs, and as additionally attractive as possible to the English musical public. (Signed) VINCENT NOVELLO, March 28, 1847.'" (Applause.)

Mr. Riseley, after briefly referring to the careers of Danby and Paxton, then pulled the cord which revealed the memorial of Webbe to public view. Short speeches were made by Mr. E. Cooper, librarian of the Madrigal Society (London), and Mr. Spencer Curwen. The West London Choral Association (under the direction of Mr. William Holmes) contributed the following glees with much appropriateness and acceptance: "Awake, Æolian lyre," by Danby, which gained a prize in 1783; "How sweet, how fresh," a prize glee by Paxton (1779); "Swiftly from the mountain's brow," by Webbe (1788), and the same composer's evergreen and beautiful glee "When winds breathe soft along the silent deep."

THE NEWPORT EISTEDDFOD.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

READERS of THE MUSICAL TIMES do not require to be told that the Royal National Eisteddfod of Wales is an institution having large and varied aims. As represented by the bardic hierarchy and the Gorsedd it conserves the traditions of the dead past while acting in the living present, and by its system of competition and reward it seeks to promote all forms of art and industry. The energy and enterprise with which this is done vary with the locality of the annual gathering. Held alternately in North and South Wales, and dependent for the scope and character of its work not upon a central body, but upon local spirit and resources, there are times when limited means decree restricted effort, and other times when ample pecuniary support warrants corresponding outlay. The meeting held at Newport during the week beginning August 1 was one of the more fortunate class. Nothing could have exceeded the liberality of the town and district in all departments of the work undertaken. A huge wooden building, admirably designed for its purpose, was erected, and a programme was drawn up at once comprehensive in character and profuse in its offers of reward to successful merit. It is no part of my duty to deal with that programme as a whole. Here the musical part alone calls for notice, and in dealing with it I shall adopt a summary rather than a detailed method, seeking to give a general idea of the proceedings and whatever in them was significant.

Taking, first, the non-competitive performances, or concerts, of which there were four, considerable variety of character may justly be claimed for them. The first was devoted entirely to music for a military band, the musicians of the Royal Marines, under Mr. Frank Winterbottom, being in attendance. This was eminently a popular occasion, for the Welshman loves a band, and has within his borders not a few excellent examples of his own raising. Thoroughly did he enjoy an admirable Bank Holiday selection, the particulars of which, however, need not here be given. The second evening concert took a higher flight, devoting itself exclusively to "Elijah," with Madame Henson, Miss Butt, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies as principal vocalists, Mr. E. Bernard Newman being the conductor. It is usual at the meetings of the National Eisteddfod to have the services of a choir specially trained. This was the case at Newport, where a large body of voices, drawn from the town and district, did whatever chorus work was needed during the week. Less frequently do we find an Eisteddfod orchestra as well as choir; that important adjunct being confined chiefly to meetings held in the big towns of South Wales. There was, of course, an orchestra at Newport, and one quite adequate to the task it had to perform; its "leader" being the experienced Mr. Woodward, of Cheltenham. "Elijah" stood well equipped, therefore, and a generally successful performance took place—successful enough, at any rate, to warrant the liberal applause of an audience much more enthusiastic than hypercritical. The soloists were excellent, Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies's rendering of the part of the Prophet being especially so, if it be conceded that a somewhat ultra-dramatic embodiment comes within the lines of propriety on the occasion of an oratorio. Mr. Davies sang without book, and alike in declamation and song made a direct appeal to the perfervid nature of his countrymen. They answered with more than a popular justification of his methods.

The third evening concert, given up in large measure to Welsh and other songs, now offers little material for comment. Among the more conspicuous selections were an overture and ballad for chorus and orchestra, "Battle of the Severn," the work of Mr. D. C. Williams, who conducted the performance. I regret that I missed this work, and that it has not yet even come under my eye. Mr. Walter Macfarren's capital overture to "Othello," conducted by the veteran composer, was another prominent feature; but purely orchestral works have as yet to receive proper attention in Wales, where the stream of musical life flows well nigh exclusively through vocal channels. Among the artists who assisted on this occasion were Mesdames Olive Grey, Ceinwen Jones, and Maggie Davies; Messrs. Gwilym Richards, John Thomas (Pencerdd Gwalia), Ffrangcon-Davies, and David Hughes. At the fourth and last concert Sir A. C. Mackenzie's "Dream of Jubal" headed the programme, and was the chief source of interest to the more cultured part of a great gathering. This work—which was conducted by the composer—did not come as an entire stranger to the South Wales public, some of whom heard it a few years since in connection with the Cardiff Festival. But it must have been new to the vast majority of the audience, which seemed as a whole to be much impressed by it. The utmost attention was paid to the work from first to last—a result with which the performance, as well as the music, had, no doubt, something to do. How the Newport chorus discharged its task may best be gathered from a letter addressed to the singers through the medium of the local press. In that communication the composer said:—

"The conductor, who has to meet for the first time a large choir and make its acquaintance at the moment of performance, always feels that he is taking a step into the unknown, and is made aware of the element of doubt which enters into the 'best laid schemes of mice and men.' True, I met a small portion of the Newport choir at the orchestral rehearsal, but the acquaintance of the entire body of vocalists had to be made before the public, when any chance of communication between ourselves was impossible. Let me briefly say that this 'rapport' between the choir and myself was completely established during the first few bars of the 'Gloria,' and lasted without interruption until the last note of my work was played and sung. I am anxious, therefore, to thank all who were concerned in the details of preparation and the careful training, which were so evident in the result achieved. Mayhap the ladies and gentlemen of the Newport chorus surprised themselves. I do not say. But they certainly surprised me with a performance which was distinguished by remarkable refinement and power. And, above all, by a complete understanding—on the spur of the moment—of the desires of the composer and conductor, who now wishes to record his most sincere thanks in this public manner.—I am, &c."

No doubt the members of the chorus proudly wear this very handsome feather in their cap as a rich reward for a painstaking effort. The solos in "The Dream" were confided to Miss Maggie Davies, Miss Butt, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. David Hughes, in whose hands they were perfectly safe. Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies, on his part, undertook to read the passages in blank verse, which his fine sonorous voice and clear delivery carried through the accompanying music to the farthest limits of the pavilion. Mr. Davies threw himself into this task with all the ardour shown in his assumption of Elijah, and was credited on all hands with a success acknowledged especially by his countrymen, who recognised some very familiar features in his declamation. At the close, Sir A. C. Mackenzie was rewarded by enthusiastic and prolonged applause. The remainder of the programme was "miscellaneous" and need not be particularised. On the whole, the general outcome of the four concerts should be considered satisfactory. Popular features, and plenty of them, are a necessity on these occasions; but the audiences heard much good music, adequately rendered and necessarily educational.

In drawing up their scheme of musical competitions, the committee sought to cover all the ground on which the art is practised. On the first day, brass and military bands had much time to themselves, and, when they had cleared away, congregational choirs and glee parties in turn occupied the platform. The vocal music was judged by Welshmen only, Messrs. Emlyn Evans, David Jenkins, and John Thomas undertaking the onerous and, sooth to say, thankless task. Not much importance, however, appeared to be attached to these opening proceedings, and the attendance was comparatively small. The competitions of the second day included soprano solos, violin solos (the candidates were of considerable merit in these), pianoforte solos, choir singing by bodies of from eighty to one hundred voices, and duet singing by soprano and alto voices. As usual, interest centred in the choral struggle, the participants in which had to sing Bach's "Rest here in peace" and a Welsh chorus by Mr. Emlyn Evans. Some very good work was done, but I cannot say that the choirs were altogether happy in the music of Bach. They sang correctly and, for the most part, well; but the severe and restrained style of the piece seemed to hamper them, and was undoubtedly foreign to their nature and instincts. For this the Welsh piece made some amends. The prizes were one of £75, with a gold baton presented by Pritchard Morgan, M.P., and one of £25, with £2 worth of music, presented by Messrs. Novello and Co. These were handsome rewards, but I did not hear that the adjudication given by Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Mr. D. Jenkins, and Dr. Rogers was seriously challenged. As no award can satisfy everybody, this must be taken as the equivalent of general acquiescence.

The third day brought another set of competitions, involving pianoforte playing, singing at sight (several entries, but no competitors), bass solos, string quartet playing, and singing by mezzo-sopranos. These exercises, in which no very superior talent was indicated, were followed by the "chief choral competition" for prizes of £200 and £50 respectively; the selections being "Now all gives way together" ("St. Ludmila") and "The Mariners," a capital work by Mr. David Jenkins. Eight choirs entered the lists—seven from South Wales and one from distant Anglesea. As the great struggle approached, thousands crowded into the pavilion and excitement ran high, for, next after a football match, Welshmen enjoy a choral fight. I must decline to picture the ups and downs of the contest, which certainly showed the best that Wales can do at the present time. It must be said, however, that the choirs varied greatly in their style of singing, ranging from the emphatic, strenuous, noisy method of Merthyr to the refined and eminently artistic rendering of the choirs from Builth, Pontypool, and Anglesea. As I listened to the series of performances, my judgment gave the first prize to Pontypool, the singing of which was, in all essential points, unbeaten. So, as it turned out, thought the adjudicators, Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Mr. Macfarren, and Mr. Emlyn Evans, by whom the £200 was justly handed over to Pontypool, Anglesea taking the second prize. The award, as the reader may gather from another page, was not popular, and has been fiercely contested, especially by Merthyr. But it was the only possible award, consistent with justice. The musical competitions of the remaining days included one for ladies' choirs (very interesting this), one for orchestra, the results of which were not specially valuable, and one for male-voice choirs, in which some good singing challenged admiration.

Taking the musical doings as a whole, I see cause for both regret and satisfaction. The work done in composition, save as to one particular case, could not be regarded seriously, while the absence of sight singing competitors and the limited results called forth by the orchestral and string quartet competitions showed weak points in Welsh music. But the Welsh are as ardent as ever when vocal music is concerned, and their choirs are distinctly improving. Much of the choral singing was extremely good and marked a decided advance in taste and skill.

THE BAYREUTH FESTIVAL.

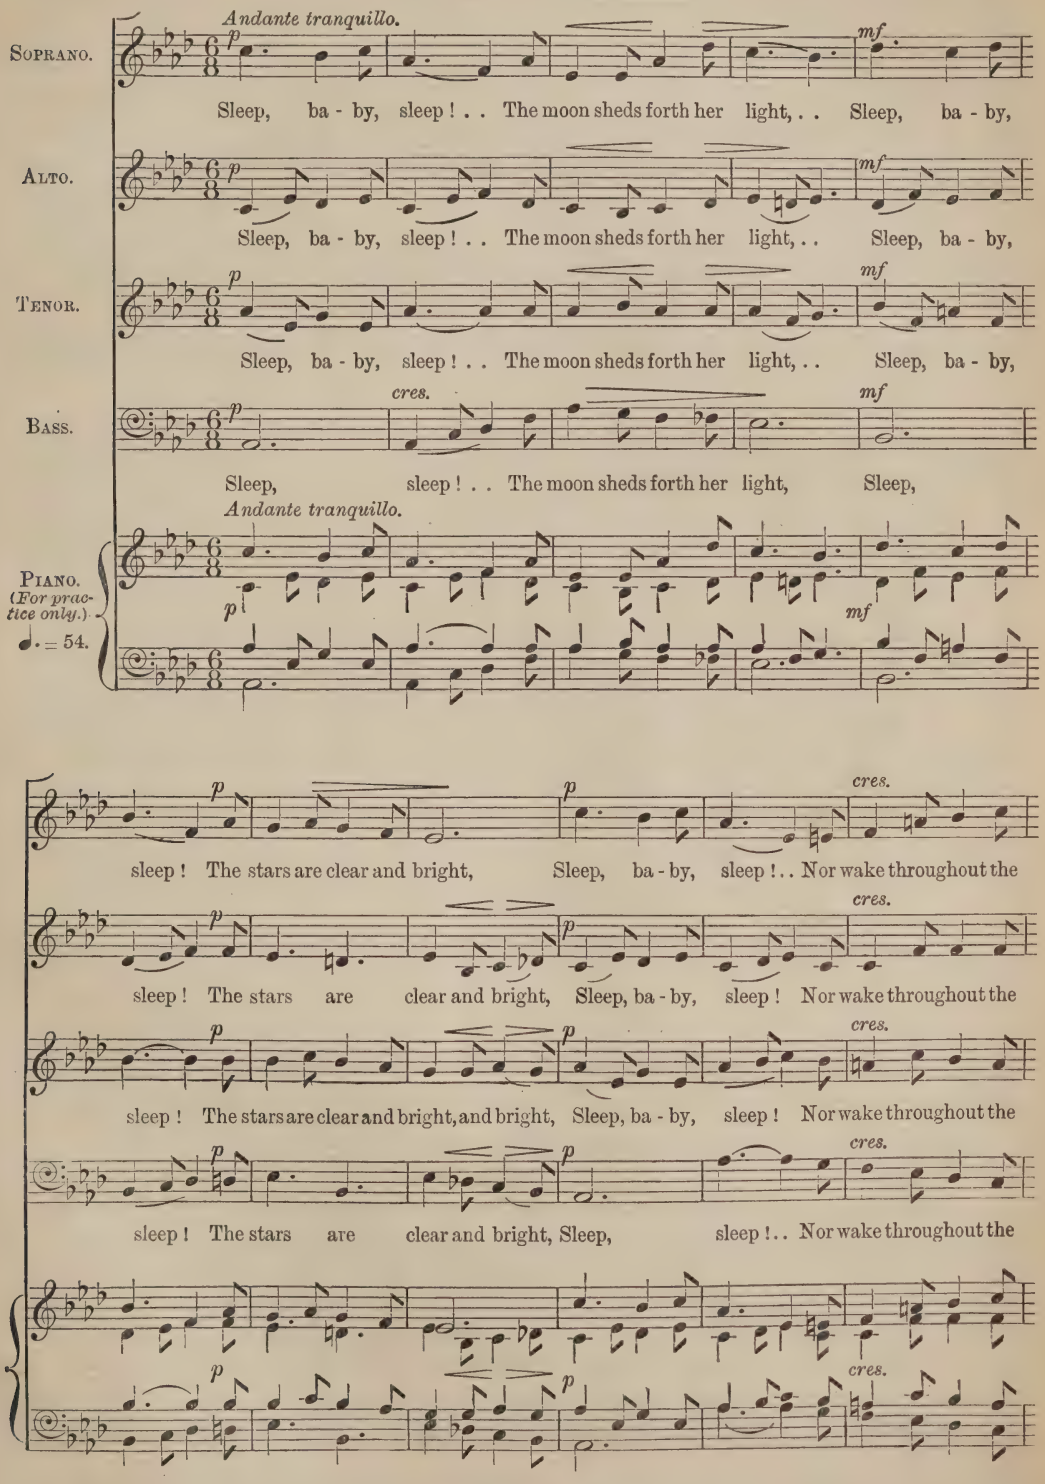
Few musicians and amateurs had either the time or the inclination to sit through the entire series of performances this year in the Wagnerian stronghold, and this is one explanation of the divergences of opinion, very puzzling to those who did not visit Bayreuth but were content to take their views second-hand. Another reason for contradictory criticism lies in the fact that specialists of every nature decline to look at the Bayreuth master's mature works as a blend of all the arts, but persist in judging them each from his own special standpoint. This holds good alike of the vocal connoisseur, the painter, the litterateur, the orchestral conductor, and the theatrical manager, each looking at the representation through his own particular spectacles. Wagner was therefore in error when he proudly averred that his work would be regarded as representing art in general, for such it is not, save by those who can sink idiosyncrasies and excuse minor defects on account of conspicuous merits in bulk. The representations of this year consisted of three cycles of "Der Ring des Nibelungen" and eight performances of "Parsifal," and there is little reason to suppose that those who were unable to attend the first cycle suffered much by having to wait for the second, with which we have chiefly to do. This commenced, on the 2nd ult., with "Das Rheingold," the interpretation being, perhaps, the best ever given at Bayreuth. Wotan figures prominently in this preliminary section of the great tetralogy, and the Scandinavian deity, who has been generally regarded as tiresome, found an uncommonly excellent exponent in a new-comer, M. van Rooy, from Rotterdam. This artist is dignified in presence and bearing, and is the possessor of a magnificent baritone voice—in timbre recalling that of Signor Ancona, though considerably more powerful—which he produces almost to perfection. M. van Rooy is the best representative of Wotan that has appeared in Bayreuth since Herr Betz created the character in 1876. Herr Vogl displayed ample evidence that time is at present passing him by, for he sang the music allotted to the fire-god Loge as well as he did twenty-three years ago, when for the first and only time at Bayreuth the malevolent god's description of his journey through the world in order to discover if anything will compensate man for the loss of "woman's wonder and worth," or, in more homely language, woman's love, was received with a speedily hushed down round of applause. Miss Marie Brema was suitably imperious and unforgiving as Fricka, and the interpretation of other parts, such as the Rhine Daughters with their tuneful music, and the minor gods who have very little to do, displayed perfect recognition of all requirements.

Paramount in the interpretation of "Die Walküre," on the following evening, must be placed the superlative embodiments of Herr Vogl as Siegmund and Frau Sucher as Sieglinde. If the lady's voice has lost some of its freshness she is as consummate an artist as ever, and the wonderful duet between the twin brother and sister proved positively exciting, even to those who had heard it many times. That steadily rising artist, Frau Gulbranson, whose face and voice slightly recall the late Mdlle. Tietjens, was admirable in all respects as Brünnhilde, Herr Wachter sang the ungrateful music alloted to Hunding with as much taste as possible, and the nine Valkyries had powerful representatives. The scenic effects in the second and third acts were superb, but would be impossible in London with our antiquated stage machinery. "Siegfried," next day, gave an opportunity for ascertaining whether the young tenor, Herr Burgstaller, who was "discovered" by Frau Cosima Wagner and trained at Bayreuth, was progressing favourably. Unfortunately on this occasion he was not in his best voice, but, being little more than a boy himself, he looked the part to perfection, and maintained all the lightness necessary in the representative of the untutored forest youth. Frau Gulbranson was very fine in the grand duet after the awakening of Brünnhilde, and, although no recalls are permitted at Bayreuth, the applause was very much prolonged. After Herr Lieban, who is such an excellent Mime at Covent Garden, Herr Breuer was disappointing. He has not such a good voice nor such a spirit of drollery. Moreover, he plays too much to the audience, a fault very rarely committed at Bayreuth. As Wotan M. van Rooy was again splendid in voice and manner, the famous scene in the first act, when the Wanderer and Mime ask each other riddles, proving very impressive. Of the smaller parts nothing need be said except to record that they were all in capable hands. The cycle of the "Ring" was finished on Thursday, the 5th ult., with "Die Götterdammerung," and this marvellous concluding section of the great tetralogy could scarcely have been better interpreted. To begin with, it was of course played without cuts, thereby giving consistency to the whole drama. The scene of the Norns, usually excised in London, is of vital importance, the breaking of the rope indicating that the old government by force and fate is to give place to a new dispensation in which love shall rule the world. Herr Burgstaller was in much finer voice than on the previous day, and in appearance and manner suggested that the careless, boyish Siegfried had developed into a full-grown man. Again, Frau Gulbranson, as Brünnhilde, displayed splendid tragic power in the second act. Her expression of horror and agony when she discovers that her shame has been caused by the man she loved was thrilling, and the great final monologue was declaimed with much dignity. The parts of Gunther, Gutrune, and Hagen are unimportant; but praise unstinted must be given to Frau Schumann-Heink, who, after doing full justice to the solemn music accorded to Erda in the earlier sections of the work, displayed her beautiful voice to perfection in the scene where Waltraute warns her sister in vain concerning the dire evils which will ensue if possession is not given up of the accursed ring. The rugged choruses of Gunther's vassals in the second act were delivered with all requisite force, and the scenic arrangements commanded admiration, though the flames at the end of the first act threatened to scorch the occupants of the front rows of stalls. This cycle was conducted by Herr Siegfried Wagner, who did not wholly justify the confidence reposed in him by his fond mother and the Bayreuth direction generally. The superb orchestra was made up of nearly 130 skilled players, but there was a want of grip at times, and when a trifling mishap occurred it was not corrected on the instant. Herr Wagner is a clever young musician, but he needs more experience to wield the baton successfully at Bayreuth.



After two days of welcome rest came two performances of "Parsifal," that monumental work which crowned Richard Wagner's career and in which the Christian idea of redemption by love that runs through all his mature music-dramas is most fully exemplified. No one who was present at the first performance of "Parsifal" in July, 1882, will forget the impressions then received by an audience not consisting of the general public, but of members of the various Wagner societies. Even they could not at first grasp the intense religious significance of the work, for after the first act there was considerable applause and after the second roars of applause. When the curtains had slowly closed after the third act, however, there was dead silence for a while and then the assemblage began to file out slowly like people leaving a church. Wagner spoke up in time from his box at the back of the theatre, and said, in his rich sonorous tones, that while he thanked his patrons for the attention they had paid to his latest work, he felt that expressions of gratitude were due to the artists who had laboured so zealously in his behalf. Then he commenced to applaud vigorously, and there followed a shout that might have been heard at the foot of the hill.

Sleep, baby!
